The income and excess-profits taxes are the backbone of our financial system. For many years the income tax was placed under the ban of the Constitution by the Supreme Court. Lucky it was that during the years preceding the war the protracted fight made to revive the income tax forced an amendment to the Constitution and resulted in the enactment of a comprehensive system of income taxation which had reached an efficient stage of development when the United States entered the war and thereby became the ready agency for raising the chief portion of our war revenue. For the present fiscal year the income tax and excess-profits tax, levied on the same principle, are expected to yield $5,500,000,000 of our estimated total yield of $8,000,000,000. I shall always be glad of the part I took in the long and oftentimes discouraging fight for the restoration of constitutional income taxation in this country, the success of which prepared the Nation promptly to meet our great war-revenue emergency. The income tax and the Federal reserve act have given the United States a fiscal system everywhere conceded to be far superior to that of any other country. Each is indispensable to the satisfactory and successful financing of a war of this magnitude.

Mr. Chairman, there are so many kinds and methods of taxation it is inevitable that not even any two people would entirely agree as to all phases of the same. The pending bill comprises a large number and variety of tax proposals. My individual view as to the relative amount of bonds and taxes which should be utilized for the prosecution of the war was expressed in this House on April 17 and May 22, 1917, when I said:

My own view is that no fixed rule can be established for all governments or for even one government. * * * The magnitude as well as the probable duration of the war are important factors; the probable cost of the war both to the home Government and the foreign Governments which it is helping to finance and the extent of its aid to them are necessary to consider; our general business and economic conditions and prospects, both national and international, should receive consideration; the amount of our prewar indebtedness and taxation, the country's resources, and our consequent ability to raise money from bonds and taxes is still another factor. * * * As to the amount of war taxes the Government should impose, I would say as large an amount as can be levied without materially injuring or seriously handicapping any important phase of our commercial, financial, and business affairs would be justifiable. This rather than arbitrary figures should be the criterion.

This view contemplates the policy of paying as we go.

The wisdom of this policy is universally recognized and practiced by each nation at war, except Germany, to a large extent. True, these large tax levies call for sacrifice and self-denial on the part of the citizen. But when disposed to grumble at war taxes let him recall how his brothers and sons are defying death in the trenches and the mine fields and he will feel ashamed that his contribution to the war is so trivial. Let every person produce more and consume less and we shall cope with all war burdens without serious difficulty. One effect of the war will be to convert ours from the most extravagant into an economic Nation. We had better pay the proposed taxes than to run the risk, through a lax or inefficient prosecution of the war, of paying a far greater tax in the nature of an indemnity to Germany. The people of Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and portions of other countries under German occupation, who are groaning under these huge indemnities levied each month, would rejoice to exchange places with any American citizen and pay all war taxes imposed by the Government. After all, it is a question of production of the necessary amount of supplies for war and domestic consumption. Since there is no other country from which we can purchase them, they must be produced here. Money to the Government, therefore, becomes a matter of secondary consideration, since it would avail little unless the people first produce the commodities to meet our war needs. In this connection we should not overlook the fact that a tax levy of $8,000,000,000 now only amounts in buying power to a tax levy of $4,000,000,000 under normal conditions before the war.

It is thus far the consensus of opinion among those best able to judge that for the present fiscal year a total levy of $8,000,000,000 would not be repressive or seriously handicapping to production or to the continuance and development of business enterprise. The United States is in a far stronger attitude to bear the enormous burdens of war than any other country. Our home production of unlimited quantities of coal, oil, gas, lead, iron, steel, cotton, copper, corn, wheat, and most other products and supplies necessary for the prosecution of the war, as well as our self-sustenance, places us in a position of untold advantage. The best part of industrial France is occupied by the enemy. England must import the chief portion of her raw materials, with the result that the balance of trade against her for this fiscal year will probably be $4,000,000,000. Since the outbreak of the war the balance of trade against England amounts to $8,500,000,000, while the balance of trade in favor of the United States amounts to more than $9,500,000,000. It is now $3,000,000,000 annually. To meet the largest possible amount of our war expenses as we go is not only sound financing in that we avoid hard tax levies during future years when they will be more difficult to pay, in order to meet both principal and interest, but by pursuing this wise policy and avoiding an oppressive load of debt in the future the United States is placed in the strongest possible attitude to meet competition in foreign trade after the war. Each country at war will later strive to pay off the chief portion of its war indebtedness with favorable trade balances which it hopes to create in the field of international commerce.

Some gentlemen would naturally turn to the customhouse and provide a general additional scale of customs duties. The difficulty, and, in fact, the utter futility of deriving any considerable amount of additional revenue through customs duties, except from such articles as sugar, coffee, cocoa, tea, silk, and rubber, must be painfully apparent to those who would advocate such action. While it is true that our imports have apparently increased to a large extent, yet at least one-half of this increase is clearly due to mere increase of values and not of quantity. Besides, the chief imports are foodstuffs and crude raw materials, most of which are kept on the free list at all times by all nations. Of our imports for the year ending June, 1918, valued at $2,946,000,000, crude raw materials constituted $1,227,000,000 and foodstuffs $750,000,000. The value of manufactures imported for this period was $394,000,000—and it is to these we look for revenue, in the main—and they are now no greater than the value of those imported for a similar period under the Payne tariff law, while the quantity would not be more than one-half. We should also keep in mind the fact that when each country entered the war, or soon afterwards, all foodstuffs and essential raw materials that were not already on the free list were promptly placed there, and in addition, embargoes were imposed against other large classes of imports as well as exports. No statesman in the legislative branch of any Government at war who has the slightest regard for his reputation for judgment or ability denies the patent fact that customs revenues are wholly unreliable and utterly inadequate in time of war. It is true that England now levies $472,000,000 at the customhouse, but it is also true that $412,000,000 of this sum comes from tea, tobacco, sugar, and coffee. It must be clear from universal experience that we can not later in normal conditions expect a maximum customhouse levy of more than $500,000,000 for any year, while our after-war expenditures will be near $4,000,000,000. This is upon the assumption that the war will end in the autumn of 1819. Our customs taxes averaged less than $70,000,000 during the Civil War. On this point may I read an extract from a memorandum sent to the President on May 15, 1918, urging war-revenue legislation during the present session of Congress, a course about which, if there was ever any doubt, that doubt has since been removed by every subsequent fact and development. I said, among other things:

The controlling question for determination at this time, I think, is whether it is deemed wise and necessary to make an additional tax levy on profits arising during the calendar year 1918. * * * The United States will probably find itself carrying a debt of not less than $40,000,000,000 at the close of the war. If the amount we are loaning and shall loan to the allies, together with the interest they are expected to pay on it, should be treated as a sinking fund, the Government would then pay 4½ per cent interest on a total debt of $40,000,000,000 during the years following the war. Pensions and similar compensations to soldiers and sailors will then doubtless exceed $500,000,000. The amount of our prewar expenditures for material, supplies, etc., will, on account of the increase in prices, be considerably augmented after the war. New expenditures growing out of the war, such as those for reconstruction work and the maintenance of new agencies created during the war which can not be discontinued at least for some time, will involve several hundred millions additional. These sums added to our normal prewar expenditure of a little over $1,000,000,000 will make the total annual expenditures after the war not less than $4,000,000,000, in my judgment.

If we can only levy $4,000,000,000 taxes during the war, when war profits are swollen and when the people are disposed to accept forms of taxation they will not accept in times of peace, how can we expect in a satisfactory way to raise $4,000,000,000 from taxation after the war, when profits have largely declined and there is demand for repeal of more or less war taxation? It is true, furthermore, that the great war expenditures contracted in inflated prices of about 100 per cent should be met as fully as possible in similar inflated values, otherwise a much larger amount of commodity values will be required to pay off a given amount of bonded debt some years after the war than at present. The principle now recognized as sound finance by every country at war is that the maximum amount of taxation which can be levied during the war without material injury to business should be imposed.

Mr. Chairman, while the Government is undertaking to raise the largest amount of taxes possible without material hurt or injury to the taxpayer, whether a business or individual, and in so doing it is now proposed to impose a maximum levy on the profits of business, it would not be unsound war taxation to impose a war-customs tax on such articles as silk, rubber, sugar, coffee, cocoa, and tea, coupled with an excise tax on sugar. This action would contribute to a better belanced system of war revenue legislation. These taxes are honest and every dollar would go into the Treasury. They would not be seriously felt by the public, and they would be as little expensive to the public as any other form of tax it may be required directly or ultimately to bear under our system of war taxation. Since the American people are abstaining in a measure from the normal consumption of such articles as flour, beef, and sugar in order that our gallant soldiers and sailors and destitute allies may receive a necessary share, what violence to public sentiment or to sound, honest taxation would result if the Government should utilize the articles mentioned as an agency for the distribution of a substantial tax levy, not at all burdensome to any one, for the purpose of securing money with which to pay for clothing, munitions, and other indispensable supplies for the soldiers in the trenches. When Russia abolished the use of vodka she struck down 94 per cent of her revenue, but Russia could then borrow from other nations, whereas there are now no nations from which we can borrow. When the war is over and Congress repeals some of the temporary and cruder classes of war taxes we shall then be obliged to find suitable substitute methods.

We should during the war embrace in our system of war and other taxation sufficient sound and equitable permanent tax methods as may be necessary to retain for the purpose of meeting our greatly augmented normal expenditures for many years following the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree to a certain extent to what the gentleman said about the difficulty of raising revenue by custom duties at this particular time during the war, and in enumerating the conditions that will prevail after the war I think the gentleman gave an accurate and instructive summary in relation to that matter. Does he not think at that time it would be possible after the war to increase the revenue we derive from customs?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I unquestionably do. When the war broke out the gentleman, I am sure, knows well that the countries which maintained the highest possible tariffs proceeded at once to repeal the tariffs on all foodstuffs and many other articles, and at the same time placed stiff embargoes on large classes of other articles, both as to imports and exports.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with tariff views we hear much discussion of trade conditions and prospects. There are many suggestions on every hand that we should now proceed in every way to prepare to meet after-war conditions. While the after-war problems are but secondary in importance to the war problems, and will probably be more complex, we should not become enough engrossed in our preparation to meet after-war conditions as to neglect some of the important and urgent things we could and should now do to bring the war to a speedy and successful termination. This is the question of present paramount and supreme importance. After-war conditions will be greatly affected by the peace terms. The time when the war ends will also be a factor. We are already sure of a great merchant marine, an unprecedented gold reserve, and adequate foreign banking facilities. We will have available our immense resources, including raw materials, to be manufactured and sold everywhere when the war closes. Europe will be greatly deficient in raw materials. The shelves of the business houses in all European and far-eastern countries will be empty, and if our manufacturers are well stocked with goods at that time they should have enormous foreign sales after the close of the war. The United States has now gone from third to first place as exporter of manufactured goods, or from a valuation of $1,099,000,000 to $4,019,000,000. Our growing export trade will retain our gold at home. Prior to our entry into the war last year we had paid $3,000,000,000 of our indebtedness to Europe and loaned $3,000,000,000 over there. This does not include Government loans of over six billions since made to allied nations. Another after-war handicap to Europe will be that the cost of her physical reconstruction will amount to $5,000,000,000.

Individually I have never shared in the persistent advocacy of the "war after the war" of which we have read so much during the past two years. Economic wars are but the germs of real wars. Trade retaliation and trade discrimination, from boycotting down, inevitably produce friction and irritation between nations, and have, in fact, been one of the chief underlying causes of most wars of the past. Should the present German rulers control the affairs of Germany as heretofore I should, of course, favor economic and every other kind of warfare against them in the future, but our success in the present war, which is certain to come within a year, presupposes the elimination of these overlords and the lodgment of power in the hands of the people. Believing as I have that the best antidote against war is the removal of its causes rather than its prevention after the causes once arise, and finding that trade retaliation and discrimination in its more vicious forms has been productive of bitter economic wars, which in many cases have developed into wars of force, I introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives during the early part of last year which would provide for the organization of an international trade agreement congress, the objects of which should be to eliminate by mutual agreement all possible methods of retaliation and discrimination in international trade. This course should tend greatly to diminish the dangerous possibilities of economic warfare and to promote fair and friendly trade relations among all the nations of the world. Dealing with the subject of competition through the tariff is another and different question. In my judgment the country that will prosper greatest after the war will be that country which develops the highest state of utility and efficiency in its production; that country which encourages invention and scientific and industrial education and training in the largest measure; that country in which capital and labor in a friendly spirit mutually work out a relationship just and fair to both with respect to each important industry. Antiquated machinery, worn-out methods, and inefficient management will have to be abandoned.

Mr. Chairman, the United States is now at a maximum capacity of production. It is in a far better position to meet war burdens under these conditions than it will be to defer them to later years, when the ability of the country to pay the high level of taxes that would then be necessary will be much less than it now is. Values and production in each line of industry can not be expected to be so high then. England expects a revenue yield of $4,500,000,000 for a full year from her present schedule. We are in a better position to raise $8,000,000,000 than England is the amount contemplated. Some one may say that the American people pay more State and local taxes than the English. It may be replied that they have county and municipal taxes to pay in England, whereas in this country more than one-half our State taxes, for example, are paid largely by those who are not subject to appreciable income or excess-profits taxes. This ratio in measurable proportions runs through the county and municipal tax payments. It will be noted that England levies comparatively few taxes, but they are general in their application. My opinion is that tax methods in any important commercial country should be as few and as general as possible, because they are more productive, less expensive to collect, frequently more equitable, and far less confusing and irritating. The big question now is to levy the maximum of revenue for war purposes, and at the same time make the most equitable adjustment and distribution possible with respect to all persons, businesses, and industries in the light of ability to pay.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is often said that England levies no local taxes; but, as the gentleman is aware, that is an error. I made some investigation of that matter, which led me to believe that the local taxes amount to more than $500,000,000.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That corresponds with the figures I have been able to obtain.

While it is true that not quite 10 per cent of the total war expenditures incurred by all nations has been met by war-tax revenue, it is also true that, with the exception of Germany, all countries have striven to make the largest levies consistent with their resources and domestic conditions. Canada has increased her revenue from $120,000,000 to $230,000,000; England, which is more representative in this respect than any other foreign country, has increased her levy from near $1,000,000,000 to $4,500,000,000. Her total expenditures for four years of war have been $39,650,000,000, of which $10,105,000,000 were raised from taxation. Deducting normal taxes and normal expenditures and allowing for the value of permanent assets, apart from loans to allies and dominions, leaves an actual war expenditure of $35,650,000,000 and war revenue of $6,105,000,000. Estimating her loans to allies at one-half value, she figures her total recoverable assets at $8,980,000,000. This would make the proportion of net war cost raised by revenue 23.04 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much, if the gentleman can state, is the total revenue raised by customs duties?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Under the recent increase in the last finance bill introduced in April they estimated that the amount to be derived is $472,000,000, but I may say that $412,000,000 of that amount is expected to be derived from tea, coffee, sugar, and tobacco.

Mr. GARNER. They are really consumption taxes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The customhouse collects the tax on those particular articles that I have named.

Mr. GARNER. But they are really consumption taxes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. To be sure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And so would they be in this country consumption taxes.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; on those articles.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How high have they gone on tea, coffee, and sugar?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I have not glanced at the rates during the last few weeks, and I could not be accurate in regard to it. I think sugar is 5¾ cents a pound, and tea 24 cents a pound. There is now considerable demand for increased war taxation there. Our loans to allies are much better placed than those of England. Russia owes her $2,840,000,000, and the smaller States $595,000,000. France, on account of German occupation, has only been able to levy new annual taxes of $449,000,000. Italy has more than doubled her prewar revenues, so that they now yield over $800,000,000. Germany has financed the war chiefly through loans, indemnities, and fiat money. It is impossible to secure accurate figures as to the exact amount of war revenue she has imposed. Her different votes of credit show general Government expenditures of $34,750,000,000 during the war. The German States have also met considerable war expenditures. The general Government there has only sought to increase taxes to meet normal expenditures, including the interest on war debt. They have failed even in this respect and have been obliged to issue bonds in a number of instances to meet interest on war loans. The total new taxes collected by Germany since the outbreak of the war aggregate $2,876,000,000. Only $1,000,000,000 of this levy, however, is a permanent tax. This amount added to her normal revenue of $750,000,000 before the war only gives her an aggregate permanent peace tax of $1,750,000,000 with which to meet fixed annual post-war expenditures of $3,500,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the United States entered the war on April 6, 1917. Our ordinary revenue receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, were $1,118,174,000. No receipts from the war-revenue act of 1917 reached the Treasury within this period. On the other hand, the Government was obliged to expend from April 6 to June 30, the end of the fiscal year, $1,218,502,000. To meet this expenditure the ordinary revenue receipts of $567,438,000 and the proceeds of the first liberty loan, $1,466,335,000, both of which amounts came into the Treasury during this period, were utilized. Of the amount expended during this time, loans to our allies comprised $885,000,000. It will thus be seen that both war and normal expenditures in this country for the latter portion of the fiscal year 1917 only amounted to $333,000,000.

Adding to the $885,000,000 loaned to the allies the amount expended by this Government for the war or for other than normal purposes from April 6 to June 30, 1917, shows $954,000,000 as the total war expenditures of the United States from April 6 to June 30 of that year. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the total ordinary and war expenditures of the Government were $12,696,702,000. Of this amount $4,738,029,000 were loaned to the allies, which would leave remaining a total expenditure of the Government for this fiscal year at $8,714,000,000. The aggregate amount of expenditures just stated were met by revenue receipts of all kinds amounting to $3,664,581,000, by proceeds of the first, second, and third liberty loans of $7,566,034,000, war savings certificates and thrift stamps of $307,019,000, or a grand total of $11,537,706,000, to which was added a sufficient amount of the proceeds of certificates of indebtedness to meet the total expenditures, as stated, for the fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman before him the percentages of amounts raised by taxation as compared with the total war expenses?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will say that I asked the Treasury Department to furnish me with the figures that would most nearly show the war expenditures from April 6, the day of our entering into the war, as distinguished from the normal expenditures on the one hand and the normal and war-tax revenues on the other. I have undertaken to insert the figures here, but I have not computed the percentages.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I glean from the figures stated by the gentleman, during the fiscal year 1918 we raised more than 40 per cent by taxation.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. A computation on the face of the figures will show, but I have not computed the percentages. During the months of July and August, 1918, the total expenditures of the Government were $3,413,795,000, and of this amount loans to the allies represented $622,735,000. The receipts of the Treasury for these two months were $785,087,000 from ordinary revenues, $929,187,000 from the first three liberty loans, and $334,000,000 from war savings and thrift stamps, or a total of $2,123,365,000. This amount was supplemented by the proceeds of certificates of indebtedness to meet the current expeditures stated. It will thus be seen that the total expenditures of the Government for all purposes since April 6, 1917, to August 31, 1918, aggregate $17,329,000,000, while the total receipts from normal revenues, liberty loans, and war savings sources for the same period aggregate $15,699,766,000, the total revenue receipts being $5,017,100,000, total proceeds from liberty loans $9,961,559,000, and the total proceeds of war savings and thrift stamps $641,097,000. Certificates of indebtedness are utilized for the purpose of anticipating both bonds and tax payments, and if necessary, to meet any temporary deficiency of either or both. The total loans to the allies from April 6, 1917, to August 31, 1918, were $6,245,764,000.

In computing the cost of the war from year to year or from period to period the terms "authorization," "appropriation," and "expenditure" should not be confused with each other. The fact also should be kept in mind that an immense portion of our total expenditures instead of being lost to the Government will constitute permanent assets. Such items as the $6,245,000,000 loaned to the allies prior to September 1 of this year and the additional sums we are now loaning to them during the present fiscal year, together with such other items as the appropriations for the Director General of Railroads, for the War Finance Corporation, for the purchase of farm-loan bonds, for the Shipping Board to construct merchant vessels, for nitrate plants, for the Alaskan Railway, and numerous other important items which will constitute permanent assets, the combined total of all of which will now approach $7,500,000,000.

The payment of war loans and taxes thus far has in no sense dislocated business or finance, and has caused even no perceptible disturbance. Business conditions are inherently sound. The failures for the first six months of this year show liabilities of only $70,000,000, which were the smallest since 1907. The total aggregate net income returned by individuals and corporations subject to income tax for the years 1915, 1916, 1917, and the estimated amount for 1918 is near $45,000,000,000 after all the usual allowances for expenses of every kind, depreciation, temporary repairs, and so forth. From this entire amount the Government has derived in income and excess profits taxes thus far less than $3,500,000,000. The added income and excess profits tax levy for 1918, estimated at $5,500,000,000, would make a combined levy from these sources of $9,000,000,000 for these four years, leaving to the taxpayers of the country $36,000,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the intention and controlling effort of the committee to apportion taxes equitably in reporting this bill. The bill contains many safeguards against any inequities that may arise from its operation. While these are intended to be comprehensive, I think some additional provisions may be necessary to carry out the general purposes of the bill with the degree of equity and efficiency desirable. I wish here to compliment in the highest terms the able and distinguished chairman of the committee and also each member for the honest, earnest, and painstaking labors they underwent in their zealous and patriotic endeavors to evolve a measure which would be acceptable to the entire country. I was somewhat surprised at one or two of my colleagues on the committee who talk on the floor so differently from the tone in which they talked in the committee. If gentlemen desire to share in the more agreeable work of prosecuting this war, they ought to be willing to share in the more disagreeable work which embraces in part the levying of war taxation. While I feel that the committee has in most respects splendidly succeeded in its purpose, yet it is but natural that in a measure of such magnitude opportunities to make an improvement here and there suggest themselves. In commenting on the concrete provisions of the bill I feel constrained, without any disposition to be critical, to call attention to certain provisions wherein some modification or addition would, in my judgment, prove helpful.

To one familiar with our present tax laws little difficulty in grasping and readily understanding this bill will be experienced. The bill in its chief effects does four things: First, in a general way practically doubles most of the existing tax rates; second, inserts a war-profits provision in the alternative with the present excess-profits law; third, codifies the income and estate tax provisions; fourth, adds a so-called luxury schedule of taxes. There are, of course, minor administrative changes or insertions here and there in the bill, as well as certain other additional or modifying provisions, but which are not generally of a fundamental nature. It will be seen that the language of the income and estate tax statutes is retained almost entirely intact.

In making a huge levy of $8,000,000,000 on the American people in one year, I can not too strongly emphasize the extreme importance of adjusting and balancing the burden with the greatest possible intelligence and care. Unless this is done, injustice and hardship will be inflicted in many cases, while on the other hand, numbers of taxpayers will escape their proper proportion. The great problem, therefore, is to adjust and apply the law to every taxpayer in such manner as will permit no one to escape nor require anyone to pay more than his just and relative share. Under a levy of this kind the country could pay $8,000,000,000 taxes with far less injury than it could pay $7,000,000,000 under a law not carefully and accurately adjusted in the manner just stated. This is the crucial problem to be solved.

The income tax comes first in the bill. Almost all civilized countries now have an income tax. Its underlying principle is that every citizen should pay in proportion to his ability, and that net income is the best measure of such ability. In the very nature of things, however, it is not designed as an exclusive tax method. By reason of the difficulties of administration when applied to the large class of persons with small incomes, another or other tax methods are necessary. It does not in any event reach the unearned increment; it does not reach estates passing by death; it does not tax consumption; it does tax wealth, which hitherto has not been reached for its fair share. It can and should distinguish between income from labor and income from capital. This would more fully carry out the theory of ability to pay. In my opinion the largest possible income-tax levy should be made for war purposes at this time. This tax is intended to deal with all gains and profits derived from normal business. The fact that for administrative reasons the exemption is made higher here than in most other countries, does not admit of as large a proportionate levy on the smaller incomes as is generally made elsewhere. Near two-thirds of the total net income of the country is comprised of those of $4,000 and under. It would probably have been wiser to have made a larger income-tax levy, and possibly to have made slightly more liberal allowance to exceptional businesses in case of hardship under the war or excess-profits levy, in view of the fact that the income levy is much more equitable. The law as codified in this bill is concededly the best income-tax law to be found in any country.

Many complain of the complicated nature of an income-tax law. Equity and simplicity should be the prime requisites of any tax law. To secure equity it is necessary, on account of our complicated business conditions, to insert numerous saving provisions, exceptions, and qualifications in the general provisions of the law. These produce the principal complications complained of. The taxpayer must realize, therefore, that in the endeavor of Congress to make his tax burdens equitable it has proceeded as far as possible to secure the maximum of equity with the minimum of complexity, notwithstanding the fact that in this endeavor complexities increase as the equities increase. There has been some confusion in the minds of many as to the meaning of profits computed under the income-tax law as compared with commercial profits. The truth is that income-tax profits and commercial profits are, and should be, the same, except to the extent prohibited by provisions of the income-tax act. Commercial profits should be the basis of taxation, provided capital expenditures of certain kinds are excluded. A statute, however, can not define just what items should or should not be deducted in computing income in each instance. It does not, in fact, undertake to do this, but oftentimes leaves the question of income to be determined on commercial principles. No fixed definition of income can be given either by Congress or by the courts. Accounting methods are different. In order to apply a comprehensive income-tax law to our somewhat intricate business situation, the cooperation of the legislative, administrative, and judicial departments in the performance of their respective functions is necessary. With no desire to criticize, I have been slightly disappointed by some of the court decisions construing and applying certain provisions of the income-tax law, because it seemed that they did not make a broad practical application, within sound judicial range, to our economic conditions, in some respects. The intimation of the court on the so-called stock-dividend question creates some apprehension in the minds of the friends of this tax. While I can not defend the stock-dividend provision of the present law in so far as it would tax a stockholder on the profits derived from the sale of his stock, which are attributable to an increase of undistributed profits, and at the same time tax the purchaser on a distribution of such profits immediately after in the form of so-called stock dividends, neither can I defend the intimated attitude of the court to the effect that when the profits of a corporation are by appropriate action transferred to capital account and new shares issued therefor they become capital and are immune from income taxation imposed on the stockholder with respect to the profits when being so transferred. It is not feasible to gauge and tax him on such profits until they are in the act of being transferred. A broad decision, as intimated, would work the most serious injury to income taxation and would go counter to a long line of English decisions on this question. It may be that the inventory provisions will meet these conditions, however. A thoroughly satisfactory tax method of dealing with the undistributed profits of corporations presents a grave problem. Many persons entertain the erroneous view that because profits of a taxable year are retained for even bona fide employment in the business, that should exempt them from taxation. If this view were sound, there would be but a relatively small amount of profits available for taxation. The problem is to levy, in effect, a proportionate amount of income taxes on profits accruing to individuals, from whatever source or through whatever agency.

The theory of the tax is that a sufficient amount of profits, whether primarily accruing to a person, corporation, or association, will and should be left, after the imposition of the tax, for all reasonable business purposes. Certainly there could be no impairment of capital, as often is the case under our general property tax laws, and it is equally certain that a substantial amount of current profits will be left undisturbed in every case. Corporations in England pay the 30 per cent normal tax on their 33⅓ per cent of undistributed profits.

A small income-tax problem, not yet satisfactorily solved, relates to the taxation of profits from the sale of property purchased many years prior thereto and not in line of business. Many income-tax laws do not undertake to reach profits other than those derived from a trade or business. In view of the tremendous number of collateral transactions in this country, however, it has been deemed important to develop along the most practical and workable lines this phase of income taxation. I think some additional legislation, both necessary and possible, should be had in this respect. While losses arising from and immediately connected with transactions which do not constitute a trade or business are proper allowances, I fear the relief offered in this respect may enable taxpayers hopelessly to blend trade losses or expenditures with those of a capital nature which have no recognition under any income-tax law. The insurance provisions need readjusting. The subject of depreciation in its application to some classes of business should, in my opinion, be given lengthy consideration and our statutes in this respect readjusted along more practical and definite lines. Some persons think all profits used in business should be exempt. Others think they should have a full return of capital before being taxed on profits. Still others think that the owner of his own capital should be allowed to deduct interest on it. The income tax, however, only looks in theory to commercial profits. Gifts, especially during the war, should be taxed at the normal income rate, but not subjected to supertax. They were made a part of the definition of income under the act of 1894. The exemption as to gifts might properly be $1,000 and $2,000. A possible danger to the successful and permanent operation of an income-tax law, as is true of all tax laws, is the disposition even of its friends to insert additional exemptions here and there and to add liberal qualifications, thereby opening many doors to those who would evade or avoid their full share of taxes. Unless the Supreme Court modifies its decisions it will declare invalid the provisions taxing the agencies and instrumentalities of the States. As to the normal tax, I think the bill could well have fixed it at 15 per cent and allowed the superrates to commence correspondingly higher on the income. The committee has rendered a splendid public service in codifying the present scattered provisions of the income-tax law. It is to be earnestly hoped that Congress will hereafter leave the body of the law intact instead of taking out entire pages for the sake of adding some slight amendment. While a distinction between income from labor and income from capital would involve some complications in the administration, I am unable to see wherein they would be at all serious. The basic normal rate agreed upon could be prescribed for all income with a proviso that income from labor, including offices, and so forth, and resonable compensation for personal services actually rendered where labor and capital are combined, should be subjected as to the amount above the personal exemption to a rate derived by deducting one-fifth of the basic normal rate. This provision was written in the first draft of the income-tax measure of 1913, but it has not thus far remained in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am gratified to see a so-called war-profits provision go in this bill. From the beginning of the war I have exerted my humble efforts to this end, upon the theory that if it was intended to reach war profits in the fullest and most accurate measure and at the same time avoid many serious inequities which would arise under a so-called excess-profits provision a war-profits measure should be enacted in the very beginning. I readily agree, as everyone must, that neither of these tax methods is a scientific, equitable method in the ordinary sense. The principal feature of equity which attaches to them is that it is entirely justifiable for the Government to take the chief portion of abnormal profits arising during the war for the payment of war expenditures. No intelligent, patriotic person has yet questioned this principle. There is some confusion of terms in defining these two tax methods. The pending bill defines the method contained in our present law as an "excess-profits tax" and the method contained in the English law as a "war-profits tax." The fact is that if the subject of the tax is to control the definition of the tax method, the English law itself is an excess-profits tax measure, and our present law is a graduated supertax on the income of corporations above a prescribed exemption and corresponding to the supertax on the income of individuals above the prescribed exemption of $5,000. A strict war-profits tax is, of course, a tax imposed on profits exclusively due to the war. A strict excess-profits tax, as the English law is officially designated, applies to the portion of profits in excess of those earned during a corresponding period called the prewar period, without inquiry or concern as to whether such excess profits had any connection with the war. Our present excess-profits law does not consider or inquire whether more or less profits were derived by a taxable concern after or before the war, but prescribes a fixed exemption of $3,000 plus 7 to 9 per cent of what is defined as "capital invested," and imposes a graduated supertax alike on the profits of all corporations above the exemption. I have always viewed each of these tax methods as somewhat inequitable, temporary war measures, which have their chief support in the policy, which no one can successfully challenge, that during the war the Government should demand and take most of that category of abnormal profits which have arisen over and above normal profits of the prewar period and apply them to the expenses of the war. The effect of this policy is to classify increased income during and under war conditions and, under somewhat unscientific methods, transfer most of it to the Treasury. In its chief features the plan this bill proposes is the best that could be offered to this end.

This general tax could not be expected to continue permanently after the war. The tax had its origin in the Scandinavian countries early in the war, when it was discovered that certain firms were making abnormal profits from the sale of foodstuffs to Germany and that certain shipowners were realizing like profits from war shipping. It was soon deemed good public policy to classify these war profits and apply a special tax to them.

As the war progressed and increased profits above those of the prewar level became general in the various industries, whether engaged directly in activities contributory to the war or not, the term "war profits" was gradually applied to this higher category of profits arising during the war and under war conditions from whatsoever source. Some 14 countries have since adopted a tax designed to reach these swollen profits. These laws vary in many important respects. The English law, which has been far more successful and produced a much larger revenue than any other, lays generally a tax on the profits in excess of the prewar profits of a given business concern, whether conducted by an individual, partnership, or corporation. I have always favored this comprehensive plan. The secret of the success of this law has been the fact that such provisions have been made as would permit each individual business to have a fair, not to say liberal, prewar deduction as a basis for a heavy tax on the profits above the deduction. As to normal business, which comprises the overwhelming number of cases, the general provisions of the law operate with fair satisfaction both to the Government and the taxpayers. The great problem is to deal in the same spirit satisfactorily with exceptional business, which, it is true, comprises a minority of cases. The English law contains special provisions for this purpose, and to this end confers on the treasury such discretion as it needs in making assessments to deal equitably with taxpayers whose methods of capitalization, income-producing factors, previous abnormal losses, prewar trade depressions, or hazards of industry bring them within the class of exceptional business.

Any war-profits tax method must contemplate and deal with normal and exceptional business. Equality in this kind of taxation can only be obtained by making various modifications of the general rules applicable to normal business in order to meet the difficulties of exceptional cases. This is due to the complexities of modern business. By no other means can the same approximate standard of relative fairness in a tax levy be reached or closely approached. The only feasible way of accomplishing this end is by conferring on the Treasury what is in the nature of judicial discretion, to enable it by different methods of computation in exceptional cases to apply the law alike to normal and exceptional business. A board of tax advisers were found necessary in this connection in the administration of the present law. I strongly urged the creation of such board by statute last year. I am gratified that it was recognized in this bill. I think our bill should go some further in allowing discretion to the Treasury. Individually I have always opposed, as Congress generally opposes, any delegation of authority where it is not absolutely necessary, but I think it can do so without an undue delegation of power. On this subject former Justice Charles E. Hughes has said:

> The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend.

In my opinion, discretion should be given to the Treasury to accept or require consolidated returns in given instances or classes of cases. A recent holding of the Supreme Court indicates that the court may hold that a parent corporation owning the entire stock and directing and controlling the activities of a subsidiary may have the right in law to make such return and be taxed accordingly. Greater latitude in exceptional cases of industries which suffered an abnormal depression during the three-year prewar period should be allowed in order that the normal profits of a representative concern may be ascertained and, if necessary, taken as a basis. Authority should also be given the Treasury to make reasonable allowances where a business has suffered an abnormal loss during the one or two years preceding the taxable year. A concern may lose 80 per cent of its capital in one year and during the taxable year make it back, but it would be subjected to an 80 per cent tax. No excess-profits law now in existence contemplates hardships of this character. Authority likewise to deal, within certain limitations, with the situations of hazardous business concerns should be given the Treasury if the spirit and purpose of war or excess-profits taxation are to be closely followed. There will inevitably be some hardships and injustices in any event, many more, in fact, than would rise under tax laws applicable to normal business conditions.

Another provision authorizing a taxable concern to allocate profits and deductions to the years of accrual in cases of contracts extending over a period of years, in a law carrying extremely high rates such as the proposed bill, would avoid more or less hardship in this class of cases. Section 302, limiting the tax according to the amount of capital, is a commendable effort to limit harshness and injustice in certain cases of small corporations. Since there is no real relationship between profits and the capital employed, because the earnings are due primarily to the activities of the principal owner, the relief contemplated may not prove as accurate and comprehensive as may be found justifiable. The English law exempts profits of husbandry, offices, and professions, when the latter have little or no capital.

I am unable thus far to see just what variety of effects, if any, the provision imposing 20 per cent on corporations rendering professional services may have. Clause 2 of subdivision A, section 326, relating to invested capital, will work injury to corporations which have been conservatively capitalized in that property of considerable value has been turned in for stock or shares of nominal, or materially less, value than that of the tangible property at the time of payment. The administration of the present law under a regulation which allows the Treasury to ascertain the true facts in a given case has been entirely satisfactory and occasioned no abuse nor an excessive number of applications for recognition in this respect.

As to the flat 10 per cent deduction allowed in exceptional cases or classes under the war-profits provision, my opinion is that this is too much in some cases and not enough in others. Variable rates from 7 or 8 per cent to 12 per cent, which would correspond to the normal percentage of earnings of each important industry during the prewar period would better fit in on business conditions. It is true this might occasion some loss of revenue, but much of it would be made up under properly adjusted income-tax rates.

In the administration of the present law, where some have conservatively capitalized a valuable piece of property for far less than its worth when taken in terms of the capital stock, to now deny them the privilege of showing the true facts often results in serious injustice and hardship. The present law is being administered in that way. The Treasury tells me they have not had an excessive number of applications for relief, but at the same time, by reason of that provision, they have saved some hardships that would otherwise have occurred.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman believe it would be possible to legislatively define invested capital in such a way that it would not bring hardships in some cases.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. As I have been saying, it is utterly impossible to put terms and designations in either of these two methods of levying war taxes that will not result in more or less inequity and injustice. There will be many cases of injustice at the very best, with Congress doing the best it can do, and with the departments under as full latitude as the statute can offer, doing the best they can do. There will still be injustices.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman mind putting into the RECORD his definition of capital, which he would propose to be substituted for the section he speaks of?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The present Treasury regulation is absolutely explicit upon the particular point I refer to, and if the gentleman will turn to that he will find it in operation now as it has been since last year.

Mr. GARNER. Regulations applying to present statutes?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The present Treasury regulations on that particular point.

Mr. GARNER. Does the present bill change the section?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes; the present bill does.

There are two sides to the controversy relative to the manner of taxing the profits of concerns earning high profits before the war and like profits during the taxable year. It can justly be contended that they should pay war-profits taxes on their higher category of profits even though common to both peace and war conditions. On the other hand, the imposition of a graduated supertax on them, as provided by the present law, does serious injustice to those stockholders who have purchased stocks on the basis of these high peace earnings. My individual view is that this class of business and its owners should be taxed a corresponding additional amount for war purposes, but that perhaps a different method which, while getting the desired amount of revenue, would not so materially break into the business structure or so greatly affect the values of stocks held by purchasers, would be advisable. No complaint on this score has arisen under the operation of the combined system of taxation in England.

The two distinguishing characteristics of a war-profits tax are that it would reach profits over and above normal profits which have arisen during the war and under war conditions, and second, its many equitable reliefs which are indispensable to its practical and efficient operation, both from the standpoint of the taxpayer and of the Government. Establish a reasonable and fair prewar standard, deal equitably with special cases, and the Government can take most of the remaining profits without injury or complaint.

Coming to the estate tax, I doubt the wisdom of the provision which is designed to impose the tax on the total amount of the net estate, heedless of the effect of similar State taxes. This action will result either in subjecting estates to a tax on a tax or in obliging the States to make their levies on the remainder after deducting Federal taxes. I quite agree that if the intention is practically to absorb inheritance taxation into our Federal system of taxes the proposed course is free from objection. I believe that property passing by death should pay much larger taxes than it has in the past, but I think there should be some definite plan of effecting an equitable apportionment between the States and the General Government. It is true that the States have been exceedingly slow in developing this tax, and it may be necessary for the General Government to take the initiative in the future. The fact that the General Government will be obliged in the future to turn to internal taxes for the major portion of its revenue raises sharply and acutely the problem of determining to what extent and from what sources the General Government and the States and their subdivisions shall secure the requisite amount of taxes for their respective needs and at the same time avoid conflicting and vicious double taxation. This presents one of the serious and important questions for solution at an early date, in the interest of the general and local governments and that of the taxpayers. Certain it is that each can not proceed to levy taxes indiscriminately and without any regard to the burdens being imposed by the other, if serious injustice and inequity to the taxpayer are to be avoided.

When the incidence of the estate and inheritance tax in this country is considered in the light of the combined effects of our State and Federal laws, my view since the present estate tax was enacted in 1916 has been that the most satisfactory general system of estate or inheritance taxation could be developed by stopping the highest Federal estate tax rate at 20 per cent or 25 per cent and combining it with a well-balanced system of graduated share taxes. This plan would take care of the revenue and at the same time would avoid the serious and harsh inequities which will arise under estate tax rates alone which run as high as 30 per cent or 40 per cent. The Federal estate tax rate should begin on estates of $25,000 and carry the minimum rate up to $50,000.

In conclusion, while this bill will offer a real test of the patriotism of the American people and will measurably tax the financial ability of the country, yet I feel that the people will meet every test just as our gallant soldiers and sailors are meeting every test of patriotism and courage. We must remember that this is not a war of the American Government within itself, but is the war of every individual citizen, whether he be in the trenches, or on a torpedo destroyer, or in the mine, or the field, or the factory. To wage the war most successfully requires the concerted efforts of each, exerted to the very maximum in his respective line. No more cheering message can be sent to our soldiers at the front than the news that the American people are cheerfully, willingly, and even gladly undertaking to shoulder and carry through our revenue and bond programs aggregating $24,000,000,000 for this fiscal year. With every citizen pursuing a true, steady course, under the matchless leadership of our great President, peace will soon crown our efforts, and it will not be a peace of negotiation with unprincipled German rulers, but a real, lasting peace—a peace by military decision. [Applause.]

APPENDIX A.

PUBLICITY OF INCOME-TAX RETURNS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1½, 1918.

MY DEAR SIR: May I venture to offer limited comment on the subject of the publicity of income-tax returns, which course has been rather vigorously urged from time to time by certain phases of sentiment in the country? I am not quite sure whether the chief reason advanced is that publicity would secure fuller and more accurate returns of taxable income, or whether it is based on the desire which has manifested itself more or less during recent years for unrestricted publicity of the affairs of business generally to the end that any improper trade policies, methods, or conduct might be exposed.

If the demand for publicity rests on the former ground, I should like to set out some of the points of the opposing views; if it rests on the last ground, without regard to the effect of publicity on the success of the tax, I should like in this connection to suggest that, however desirable and necessary this character of publicity may be—and I strongly favor it to the fullest extent suggested by the public interest—the plan should not be coupled with and made a part of the general tax law unless it were calculated to sustain, rather than materially to injure the operation of, the tax law.

Attention may be called to the enactment of the Federal Trade Commission act, one of the prime purposes of which was publicity of the inner affairs, private-trade methods, trade practices, and conduct of business concerns whenever deemed to be in the public interest. This act, however, imposes penalties on any officer or employee of the Federal Trade Commission for divulging any facts of this character developed by the commission, unless first authorized to do so by the commission itself. The commission is only authorized to make public such portions of the information obtained by it "as it shall deem expedient in the public interest," and it is entirely prohibited from making public "trade secrets and names of customers." The report of the commission after an investigation of a business concern on charges of antitrust practices can only be made public in the discretion of the commission. It will thus be seen that careful restrictions against any general publicity are contained in the law, one of the underlying purposes of which is to expose to the condemnation of the public and, by appropriate official proceedings, to curb certain business practices, methods, or conduct, including that prohibited by antitrust and other legislation.

What is, or at least what should be, the main ground on which the policy of publicity of tax returns is urged, is to secure fuller and more accurate returns of taxable income. The controlling purpose of any tax statute designed to secure a large revenue yield should be such satisfactory and effective administration as would secure the maximum yield, and no other plan or purpose should be allowed materially to hamper or handicap the law operating to this end.

In the abstract and at the first blush it seems most natural that these tax returns might or even should be subjected to any and every kind of publicity at all times. Assuming, as I have, that the Department of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission, and numerous other governmental agencies and authorities have been given ample statutory authority to deal effectively with any and all acts, trade practices, methods, or other conduct on the part of any citizen or business concern which the Federal laws have thought it wise to suppress or prevent, I have investigated and reached my individual conclusion with respect to the proposed general publicity of income-tax returns solely from the standpoint of the most satisfactory and successful administration of the income-tax law and the securing of the largest possible yield of revenue. Viewed from this standpoint I have been unable to bring myself to the conclusion that publicity would secure the most desirable revenue results. I may first refer to the experience of some governments which have tried out income taxation for the longest periods. England after 75 years' experience with her present income-tax law retains her policy of keeping the results secret. There is no demand from any source, so far as I am advised, for publicity of English income-tax returns. Holland retains secrecy under her income-tax law, which has been in operation some 25 years. Denmark pursues the same policy of secrecy under her income-tax law, in operation for 14 years; Austria pursues the same policy under her law, enacted some 75 years ago; Canada's recent income-tax law contains the same provision; France in her recent law has some form of secrecy, the exact nature and extent of which I am not definitely informed. This policy of these different countries, after many years' trial, is controlled entirely by the question of the most satisfactory administration and the largest revenue yield of their respective laws. They evidently have not felt justified in allowing considerations of collateral or other government policies, however strongly and plausibly urged, to effect a change of this policy.

Let us now turn to the United States. The first Civil War income-tax acts did not prohibit publicity. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue early recommended a provision of secrecy to Congress. This was disregarded, however, until the income-tax act of 1870 was enacted. A lengthy debate on this act occurred in Congress, during which Garfield referred to one feature of the income tax "which has made it very odious in many parts of the country," namely, publicity of returns. The outcome of the discussion was the insertion of a provision in section 11 requiring secrecy, and it became a law. The view on which this provision was inserted was that it would meet the complaint that income-tax laws are inquisitorial, and also that publicity often discloses secret trade processes, methods, etc., even though ever so legitimate, and that therefore a taxpayer would be more encouraged to make a full and complete return when he had the assurance that his trade secrets, processes, etc., would not be exposed to his competitors.

The strength, stability, and perpetuity of the income tax is based on the rather fixed opinion among the people generally that in both theory and practice it accomplishes relative fairness among the taxpayers more accurately than any other tax method thus far devised. Both now and after the war it is extremely vital that a tax method productive of a larger revenue than any other should be safeguarded by the most effective means. Whatever may be thought or said to the contrary, there is a phase of human nature which, while entirely willing to make full and complete return of income and pay taxes accordingly in the belief that all taxpayers are receiving equitable treatment, is at the same time utterly averse to the idea or general publicity of private business methods and private business affairs. The States and the Federal Government can provide for investigations and full publicity of business methods, practices, and affairs generally by separate enactment, as has already been done to a measurable extent. Publicity at this stage, when business conditions and methods have become far more complicated and consist of a far greater variety than those in existence during and following the Civil War period, would be resented by the taxpayer to a correspondingly greater extent than it was during the operation of the Civil War acts. I strongly favor any and every kind of publicity needed with respect to all phases of our financial, commercial, and industrial activities, but I think it unwise in the light of almost universal experience in the past to discredit or break down the income-tax system or seriously jeopardize it by utilizing this law instead of some separate law or laws for publicity purposes.

The Federal income-tax act of 1894 in section 34 reenacted section 3167 of the Revised Statutes, containing secrecy of returns, and without special opposition, so far as I now recall. In this connection it is my recollection that when this act was declared invalid by the Supreme Court the Treasury directed that all income-tax returns on file be burned. The Federal corporation excise act of 1909 contained a provision that the returns filed in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should constitute public records and be open to inspection as such. It was soon deemed wise in the interest of the more successful administration of the law to adopt secrecy, with the result that an appropriation bill which passed Congress in June, 1910, among other things provided that these corporation excise-tax returns should be open to inspection only upon the order of the President, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President. The Treasury later in the year issued a regulation, which the President approved, restricting inspection of these returns virtually to certain officials of the Government under certain conditions and to stockholders of a given corporation which had filed its return. This regulation also provided that returns could only be inspected in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This policy of secrecy was followed without particular objection or complaint until the repeal of the law.

The Federal income-tax act of 1913 contains secrecy as to individuals, but allows inspection of corporate returns upon the order of the President, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Treasury and approved by the President, which was the same provision as that contained in the amendment to the corporation excise act of 1909. It contained the additional provision, however, that the proper officers of any State imposing a general income tax may, upon the request of the governor, have access to said returns or to an abstract thereof showing the name and income of each corporation, at such times and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The President accordingly approved a Treasury regulation under the act of 1913 for the benefit of State officials whose States have a general income-tax law. This regulation also allowed Federal officials and stockholders to make inspections under certain conditions very similar to the Treasury regulation allowing inspections under corporation excise act of 1909. The States, however, are only allowed, I believe, to secure the name of the corporation and its income. The character and extent of publicity of income-tax returns above described practically represents the present policy of publicity of the Federal Government under existing income-tax law.

Wisconsin has the most modernized, successful, and comprehensive income-tax law of any State. It contains a provision requiring secrecy of returns. A new, progressive income-tax law of Massachusetts requires secrecy except as to the name and address of the taxpayer. It will thus be seen from the proven experience of foreign countries, of our Federal Government, and of the States, which have had the most successful revenue-producing income-tax laws and which has been able most successfully to overcome the objection of inquisitorialness, that secrecy of returns has been found essential to this result.

Another consideration and object lesson which arises in connection with the publicity proposal under our Federal law relates to the general property tax systems in most of the States. It is a fact generally recognized that the general property-tax systems of most of the States have measurably broken down in their administration, with the result that personalty, and especially intangible personalty, almost entirely evades or avoids taxation. Some of the States, such as Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New Hampshire, have always maintained the widest publicity of tax returns under their general property-tax systems, but this system has fallen down just as rapidly and extensively in those States as it has in other States where publicity was not practiced or permitted. This experience of the States with publicity proves, at least, that it was powerless to increase or even maintain the revenue yield, or to prevent the breaking down of the laws. This experience but illustrates that phase of human nature which discourages and gives but little credit to the informer, no matter how good or worthy his intentions. No tax or penal law, the successful operation of which is dependent upon facts voluntarily furnished by informers, with or without pecuniary reward, can expect more than a precarious existence.

With respect to the question of securing information, the present income-tax law specifically requires, under severe penalties, every citizen who has personal knowledge of the receipt of income by his neighbor or another citizen, by reason of having paid it, to transmit such information in writing to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in all cases where the amount of fixed income exceeds $800, and in case of interest from corporate bonds without regard to amount. This provision, therefore, really provides for and requires all direct information, except what might be rumor or hearsay, save as to isolated items or as fixed income under $800.

There is still another condition arising from the operation of the present general property tax systems of the States which should be considered by the Federal Government in determining the policy of publicity. It is a well-known fact that when a citizen undertakes to make a full return of his property at its full value the present general systems of the States impose a most severe penalty on his honesty by levying practically confiscatory rates, which amount to near 40 per cent of his income on the average. The result is that most citizens in the various States by general consent give in their real property at figures substantially below its value and their personalty, on the average, at almost a nominal value. The tax rates of the States are now almost confiscatory when applied to full values, for the reason that they have been raised to considerable heights in order to secure adequate revenue from greatly scaled valuations of property which the citizens are now in the habit of giving in for taxation. From past experience it would appear but natural that if the citizen should make a full and complete return of his income for Federal taxation this would be equivalent to making a like full return to his State in many cases, and the result would be that he would undertake to make the same inadequate return to the Federal Government that he now makes to the States rather than to have the full value of his property subjected to the present practically confiscatory rates of the States. If it would assist the States in rehabilitating their present general-property tax systems and equalizing their tax burdens under these systems I should strongly favor any reasonable sacrifice on the part of the Federal Government in aiding to bring about this situation; but if instead of revitalizing and putting into successful operation the grossly inequitable and broken-down general-property tax systems of the States the effect of publicity would be likewise to discredit and more or less break down the Federal income-tax system, I am unable to discover any advantage or benefits which could be reaped either by the States or the Federal Government from such course.

Whenever the States reform their general-property tax systems, or whenever they adopt general income-tax laws similar to the Federal law, there could and should be the fullest and freest cooperation between the States and the Federal Government in the successful administration of their respective laws, just as there is cooperation now with respect to State and Federal income tax on corporations.

My individual opinion is that the only effective method by which either the States or the Federal Government will ever be able to reach for taxation in full measure the income from personalty, and especially intangible personalty, will be under a system of so-called collection or retention at the source.

In conclusion, I may call attention to the course of the Treasury Department under authority now given it by statute to compile and make public income-tax statistics. Under this statute the Treasury will give amount of the individual and corporate income as a whole, by States, by industries, by classifications as to the number of taxpayers, amount of income and taxes paid as to classes of individuals, the percentage of the income of each to the total amount, as well as the percentage of taxes paid to the total, etc. This information, which will come out annually as to each preceding tax year, should meet practically every requirement, expectation, or desire of the public in considering and dealing with economic conditions, apportioning the tax burdens, and properly curbing or regulating any practice, method, or conduct of general business or any class of business.

Very respectfully, CORDELL HULL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3439. An act for the relief of certain homestead and desert-land entrymen; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 3522. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 11, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12773) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Little Calumet River, in Cook County, State of Illinois, at or near the village of Riverdale, in said county, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 773), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4598) further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 774), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DEWALT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12786) to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River, from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 775), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. KAHN introduced a bill (H. R. 12910) to amend section 24 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ELLIOTT: A bill (H. R. 12911) granting a pension to Lewis M. Strain; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 12912) granting an increase of pension to L. C. Bohannon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 12913) for the relief of Edna R. Brady; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHOUSE: A bill (H. R. 12914) granting an increase of pension to Orceneth F. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, submitting a report of the Federal trade committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Petition of Frederick W. Evans, for enactment of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Memorial of the Board of School Commissioners of Baltimore, Md., favoring "The Star-Spangled Banner" as the national anthem; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. SNOOK: Petitions of H. H. Miller and 35 others, of West Unity, Ohio, and of A. C. Schantz and 66 others, of Archbold, Ohio, protesting against the proposed rate of taxation on the sales of automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. VARE: Memorial of the White Haven Sanitarium Association, favoring House bill 9223; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Petition of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New Rockford, N. Dak., urging war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, September 11, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have committed our way into Thy hands. Our national problem is to know and to do the will of God. We pray Thee to give the inspiration of Thy Spirit that we may discern the path of duty and right and by Thy grace maintain the ideals that have been committed to us as a Nation. Grant us Thy guidance and blessing this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Hon. IRVING W. DREW, appointed by the governor of the State of New Hampshire a Senator to fill the vacancy in the Senate created by the death of the late Senator GALLINGER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials were read, as follows:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that, pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of New Hampshire, I, Henry W. Keyes, the governor of said State, do hereby appoint IRVING W. DREW a Senator from said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the death of JACOB H. GALLINGER, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness: His excellency our governor Henry W. Keyes, and our seal hereto affixed at Concord, this 2d day of September, A. D. 1918.

HENRY W. KEYES, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.]

EDWIN C. BEAN,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the newly appointed Senator will present himself at the desk for the purpose of taking the oath of office.

Mr. DREW was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. LODGE; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF GASOLINE (S. DOC. NO. 277).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the United States Fuel Administrator, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a statement relative to the production, consumption, and exportation of gasoline, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CURTIS presented resolutions adopted by the Pecos Valley Water Users' Association, of El Paso, Tex., favoring the enactment of legislation for the reclamation of arid and swamp lands for the use of soldiers returning from the war, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, 1,050,000 citizens, North, South, East, and West, have petitioned the Senate of the United States in favor of equal suffrage. The petitions were circulated by the Hearst newspapers, and I desire to present them to the Senate. The petition of the 1,050,000 is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The President says that the suffrage amendment should be passed as a just recognition of the work American women have done for the support of the war. We agree with the President.

The President says that this suffrage amendment is a necessary war measure; that it will help to win the war.

Senators, that alone is surely reason enough why you should vote for the amendment.

Senators, your petitioners urge you to stand by the President and to heed his advice and vote for the suffrage amendment, both as a war measure that will help us to win victory sooner and as an act of high justice to the patriotic women of the United States.

The women in my State have long enjoyed suffrage, and as a result of that experiment I am free to state that it is an example worthy to be followed by the other Commonwealths of the country and by the country itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHAFROTH. For the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary] I submit the views of the minority on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President without the intervention of the Electoral College, establishing their terms of office from the third Tuesday of January following their election, and fixing the time when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin, and I ask that they be printed as part 2 of Senate Report No. 165.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed.

RESURVEY OF TOWNSHIP LINES.

Mr. NORRIS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 8004) authorizing the resurvey and retracement of lands heretofore returned as surveyed public lands of the United States under certain conditions, and I submit a report (No. 566) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the application of the owners of three-fourths of the privately owned lands in any township covered by public-land surveys, more than 50 per cent of the area of which townships is privately owned, accompanied by a deposit with the United States surveyor general for the proper State, or if there be no surveyor general of such State, then with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of the proportionate estimated cost, inclusive of the necessary work, of the resurvey or retracement of all the privately owned lands in said township, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, subject to the supervisory authority of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be authorized in his discretion to cause to be made a resurvey or retracement of the lines of said township and to set permanent corners and monuments in accordance with the laws and regulations governing surveys and resurveys of public lands; that the sum so deposited shall be held by the surveyor general or commissioner when ex officio surveyor general and may be expended in payment of the cost of such survey, including field and office work, and any excess over the cost of such survey and the expenses incident thereto shall be repaid pro rata to the person making said deposits or their legal representatives; that the proportionate cost of the field and office work for the resurvey or retracement of any public lands in such township shall be paid from the current appropriation for the survey and resurvey of public lands, in addition to the portion of such appropriation otherwise allowed by law for resurveys and retracements; that similar resurveys and retracements may be made on the application, accompanied by the requisite deposit, of any court of competent jurisdiction, the returns of such resurvey or retracement to be submitted to the court; that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations to carry this act into full force and effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 4886) providing for the sale of certain lands in the original town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and I submit a report (No. 565) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a short bill, and is in the nature of an emergency act to authorize the sale of a very small tract of land to a mill company that is constructing a mill to be used in spruce production in connection with the airplane work. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, in line 4, to strike out the name "Gerbaugh" and insert "Kerbaugh," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell to the Siems, Carey & H. S. Kerbaugh Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, that part of United States hospital reserve in the original town site of Port Angeles lying north of the Northern Pacific Railroad tract as now located thereon at such a price as may be agreed upon between said company and the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue patent therefor upon payment of the sum agreed upon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 300, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk, at the rate of $150 per month, for a period lasting from September 14, 1918, until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 4919) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to George Van Voast (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 4920) granting a pension to Isaac D. Hamilton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4921) to provide relief for the drought-stricken portions of the United States; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 4922) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 173) directing the Court of Claims to investigate claims for damages growing out of the riot of United States negro soldiers at Houston, Tex.; to the Committee on Claims.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF MINERAL OILS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 301), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Bureau of Mines be directed to send to the Senate any information in their possession in regard to the production and consumption of crude petroleum and other mineral oils in this country, the amount required for export, and the estimated stocks on hand at the present time.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS (S. DOC. NO. 275).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the other day there was presented to the Senate a message from the President of the United States transmitting the report of the Director General of Railroads, and in that report the Public Printer finds a diagram of the States of the Union indicating the railways that have been operated by the Director General. I ask that the Public Printer be authorized to print this diagram in connection with the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if there are any extra copies of that report ordered printed?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator there are not. I do not know how many will be wanted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have had some requests myself, and I imagine there will be quite an extended demand for the report.

Mr. SMOOT. That will develop.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the committee will print extra copies.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee can print them if they are desired, up to a thousand copies.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was ordered printed by the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. It was ordered printed by the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. And extra copies will be ordered printed by the committee if there is a demand for it?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is an important report and extra copies ought to be printed.

PRINTING OF ADDRESS BY SENATOR PHELAN.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have here a copy of an address by the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] published in the record of the Commercial Club of San Francisco, which was delivered before that club August 17, 1918, on the occasion of a reception gotten up for M. Albert Metin, of the French cabinet, who was on a mission to Australia and who died after having reached San Francisco. The intended reception was really in the nature of a memorial exercise, and on that occasion Senator PHELAN delivered an address dealing with the relations between the United States and France, which, I think, is worthy of being published in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I did not hear who delivered the address.

Mr. PITTMAN. Senator PHELAN. It was in the nature of a memorial exercise at what was intended as a reception to M. Albert Metin. M. Metin died and it was turned into a memorial exercise. The address largely deals with the life of the deceased and with the relations between this country and France. I ask that it be published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address of Senator PHELAN referred to is as follows:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, your meeting has been turned into a memorial. There is nothing so common as death, and yet, when it comes in all its suddenness, there is nothing so surprising and so appalling. In view of the tragedy which is being enacted on the fields of France there is a strange significance given to the words of Bryant, that all who walk the earth are but a handful to those who sleep within its bosom.

Verdun, the Marne, and now Chateau-Thierry are a graveyard. Men there are giving up their lives every moment for a great cause, while we pause in wonderment at death. It cometh as a thief in the night, we are told. And, perhaps, it is because of the sudden and unexpected character of the death of the great statesman, whose loss we mourn, that we are making account of it. Perhaps it is because, as a guest of our city, he came in the fullness of his vigor to render important service to his country that we feel the shock of his taking off. It has come home to us. We read of casualties but we see the grim image of death stalking in the streets of a peaceful city and striking down men not engaged in warfare, not engaged in actual fighting or needlessly exposing themselves, but men following the even and orderly pursuits of life.

The loss of M. Metin will be a great one to his country. He was distinguished in the sciences. He was a student of public affairs and economics. He served as a member of the French cabinet, with the portfolio of labor, and it was in the interest of the industrial welfare of the people that he had taken up this mission to go to the remotest corners of the earth and to come back and inform his Government and inform the world of those conditions necessary for a full comprehension of our duty to-day in preparing for that period after the war which will engage the highest attributes of statesmanship. So his loss is not only a loss to his friends, it is a loss to the cause in which he was engaged, and to that extent it is our loss.

This man, student, statesman, engaged in the constructive work of administration and reform in his own land, found time, we are told, in common with his gallant compatriots, to enlist in the Army, and he bore upon that breast, now silent forever, the decoration of France—the Croix de Guerre, won by the exercise of superb courage upon the field of battle.

And so he dies crowned with glory.

Since all must life resign
Those sweet delights which decorate the brave,
'Tis folly to decline
And steal inglorious to the silent grave.

So he wore with pride the decoration put upon his breast by the President of the Republic; and in giving up his life he leaves behind him the example of a soldier and a statesman, and so it may be said he has not died in vain.

It can not be said that great men die in vain, because it is still true that they rule as from the grave. The example they set, the researches they have made, the study they have given to the great problems of life, remain a permanent record. His thought is embalmed in 12 volumes, we are told. So it can not be said that his passing—a great personal loss to his friends, a great present loss to his country—is necessarily an irreparable loss to the world. He might have accomplished much more, but what he has accomplished belongs to us. Christ is stronger after these thousand years than He was when He gave up His life for humanity. Washington, dead a hundred years, is our leader to-day.

I often think of the men who are dying on the fields of battle. What have they accomplished in the face of an implacable foe?

Few survive to tell the story,
Few survive to share the glory;
How they vanquished side by side,
How they conquered, how they died;
But the land which gave them birth,
Crowns them monarchs of the earth.

That is a poetic tribute and prophecy and relates to the men who die in battle. Quoth the poet in his wisdom, "the land that gave them birth crowns them monarchs of the earth." That is to say, whatever they have done by way of sacrifice for us is an impelling and irresistible force requiring us likewise to serve. They rule us because we can not in good faith, honor, and decency suffer them to have died in vain. When you are told that your boy has died in a noble cause his voice, though still, is imperative. You take up the sword which he has laid down and carry it to a final victory. So, indeed, we are still ruled from the grave.

This man, I told you, was not only a statesman but a soldier. Then the command came to him to go across the perilous sea, beset with submarine danger, and over the sea he came and over the continent he came. The perils and hardships of travel are greater now than ever before; and yet, obedient to the command, no matter what was his physical condition, he came, and his death in the service of his country is just as glorious as though he had died upon the field of battle.

The cause for which he died—the cause of France, if you please, is America's as well. His death has unified, if such a thing were necessary, the hearts of Americans and French in this community. Indeed, we are bound in a cause from which we can not be separated even by death. The cause of France and America is so indissolubly associated not only by the historic traditions of the past but by present service that what Benjamin Franklin said as a mere sentiment now has become an actuality, with our million men upon French soil, that every American has two countries—his own and France. [Applause.]

It was a Californian, my friend Col. Stanton, who, when unexpectedly called upon to address the multitude before the statue of Lafayette given to the French by the school children of America—there, close to the Louvre, I remember it well—he looked about him for an inspiration; and, not being a man of speech, he simply uttered the words than which none could be more eloquent, "Lafayette, we are here!" And so, wherever there is a call from France, wherever their people are in distress, wherever honor is due them, as in our community to-day, every American will respond lovingly and affectionately, for the love which we have for France is something we received in the very hour of our birth, because without France we would not have been able to have asserted our independence and our sovereignty and be a nation at all. We are brothers, blood kindred, France and America.

I remember my earliest school experience was in San Francisco, where I went to a little French school conducted by Madame Maum, on old Powell Street; and I have preserved in a very feeble and poor way the instruction which I received at that time. I remember—and I will repeat to you—the story of Mary, Queen of Scots, who, after spending her honeymoon—the ladies will remember it—at Chenonceaux in the beautiful region of Touraine, like in many respects our own beloved California, was sent out of the country and soon gave up her life. And in leaving the shores of France she said:

Adieu, charmante pays de France,
Que Je dois tant cherir
Berceau de mon hereuse enfanee
Adieu, adieu, te quitter c'est mourir.

Good-by, most charming and lovely France, to whom I owe everything that is dear and sweet in my life; the cradle of my girlhood, good-by, good-by. To leave thee is death.

And every true Frenchman feels that same sentiment, that to leave his beautiful France—his Paris, the capital of the world, and come into a strange land, no matter what may be its attraction, is to him death; and M. Metin, in leaving France, indeed, left to die.

The affection which that country has for its own people is shared by our people, and the reasons are manifest. We go there and find a hospitable people, who open to us the doors of their superb galleries and museums, their public places, and they confer upon our boys and the young women every opportunity which their own children enjoy in pursuing the arts. Their Ecole des Beaux Arts is free to all Americans, and our people have gone there and profited by the instruction given them in that great land. It is a land of creative genius—music, painting, sculpture, everything in the highest degree. There thrives as in its native soil, literature, science. Is there anything that France does not possess, or possessing has not generously given it to the world? And yet, the Germanic autocrat has stated—in view of the circumstances it is hardly credible—that the object of German ambition is to impart its "kultur" to the people of the world. The idea of giving German kultur to France, or to England, or to the United States, which has absorbed from France and England and Italy the best that they have in the domain of science and art and statesmanship! It is the most presumptuous claim that was ever made for a cause, seeking to justify it, that they were giving something better than we have. The fact is that the genius of France is for man and for humanity and for fellowship. The genius of Germany is for superman, for autocracy, for domination. France—humanity; Germany—superhumanity, if I might coin the word. And that means that the German idea is that there is no love and affection and giving in the world, no gentle grace, no generous disposition. Everything is based upon force and the survival of the fittest, right in the face of Christian teaching for 2,000 years; right in the face of the practice of France and the Latin countries who believe in humanity and believe in fellowship and believe in sharing what their genius has created and endowed with their neighbors less endowed.

And you find that the spirit of Germany is opposed, as illustrated by its autocrats—is diametrically opposed to the spirit and genius of France, and hence irreconcilable. There is no way of overcoming the danger of world domination by the Hun, with its false civilization based upon force and the survival of the fittest, than to put him down by his own weapons; and our great President, a man of peace, hesitated long before he declared that the only way to meet this grave danger is by force, and by more force, and then still more force, putting upon our population, as Congress is doing to-day, to the last man, if necessary, the duty to save the world, humanity, civilization, and democracy, for the generations that are yet to come, for that precious possession handed down in trust to us by our French revolutionary sires, as well as by our American revolutionary sires, and by our English revolutionary sires, justice and freedom!

The charter won from King John at Runnymede was really the foundation of the American Constitution. It was a deadly blow hurled at the head of autocracy. I was at a Fourth of July celebration in Washington recently, and the Declaration of Independence, as customary, was about to be read in the very presence of the British Ambassador—which seemed to me a most embarrassing moment, but the chairman of the committee said, "Now, I am going to read, as customary, the Declaration of Independence; and I wish to remind the audience that it is directed against a German who was temporarily seated upon the throne of England." [Applause.]

Why, France saved civilization. Theodoric stopped Attilla's Hunnish invasion at the Battle of Chalons, 451 A. D., and saved civilization. Charles Martel, at Tours, 732 A. D., drove back the hordes of Saracens and Arabs which would have overwhelmed Europe and destroyed her civilization, just as the Goths had overwhelmed the Roman Empire, wiping it out, utterly destroying it, leaving no stone upon stone, and only what survived was carefully gathered together by a few men of the Middle Ages, which bridged over the last gap between the great Roman Empire and the modern world. Those few men deserve all praise for preserving the learning and art of the past that they would be handed down to us; but the Hun would have razed every fragment of them to the ground, and had almost succeeded in doing it. The French drove back these invading tides, and Sobieski, at the gates of Vienna, performed the same service, and Poland, the country now suffering on account of German aggression, saved civilization from the Mongols.

And hence, when we are told that the purpose of the autocrat of Germany, or Prussia, is to give us a civilization, we must recall the fact that we have a civilization and that what civilization we have was saved by the French, and the Poles, the very people against whom he is directing his shafts. France is responsible for the birth of European freedom. Her sons, longing for liberty, suffered long also from the autocrats—from the Louises who ground the people in the dust. Read the story of Young—a narrative of the time. See the deplorable condition in which these good French people were under their ornamental and tyrannical monarchs. And finally, they arose and threw off this burden of falsely representative government, because, who dare say, in the light of history, that the reign of the Louises in any way reflected the genius and character and liberty-loving purpose of the French? I think the German people, released from the autocracy of the Hohenzollerns, will show that same spirit; because, did they not show it in 1848, before the organization of the German Empire? And did they not come in vast numbers to this country and settle and become exemplary citizens? I have no sympathy with the criticism of the German people, and I dislike—and I share the dislike of the administration, in seeing them taunted with the fact that they are Germans. Most of them are rebellious Germans, and would be willing, were it in their power, to overthrow that dynasty and establish a government more representative of the people. And that thing is going to come inevitably, because that is the purpose of our warfare. The President has said that in the council of nations after the war Germany may be admitted provided the Hohenzollern dynasty and its methods be repudiated by the German people. He has made that declaration. [Applause.]

But we all love the French, because they are men of red blood, inspired with patriotic fervor. We love the Marseillaise, the greatest national song of the world, because it is a call to arms arousing the people to defend their rights. The French Revolution was a horrible thing. It destroyed right and left every obstacle in its way, but it was a necessary thing. Just as war on the vast scale which we see it to-day is necessary for the purpose of reestablishing democracy, so was the French Revolution necessary to create democracy. Long held down, the people broke in their fury and destroyed their tyrants. And the Russian people are undergoing such an evolution to-day; and though whatever may be its forbidding aspects, we must always parallel it with the French Revolution, and the horrors may continue until they find at last their level, and realize, under the leadership of wise men who are sure to arise, that their duty is to respect the lives and property of one another in order that they may enjoy peace. But they do not want peace unless they have at the same time an assurance of reward for their labor, and of the enjoyment of their political rights which have been outraged by the Romanoffs all these centuries. We must put ourselves in the place of these people and not condemn them on account of the atrocities of which we hear. We must realize that we possess everything worth having, and we are fighting to preserve it. The stake is so great that we are willing to make the supreme sacrifice, and they are fighting simply to enjoy what we have so long possessed. And they will win.

A great writer has said that democrats and aristocrats, patricians and plebeians, have alike dyed their hands in blood in working out the problems of politics; but impartial history declares that the crimes of the popular party have been lighter in degree, whilst they have more in themselves to excuse them. And if the violent acts of the revolutionists have been held up the more conspicuously for condemnation, it is only because the fate of gentleman and nobleman is more impressive to the imagination than the fate of the peasant and the artisan. [Applause.]

And so this "First Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood of human sacrifice and parents' tears"—this Hohenzollern chief, bent upon forcing dominion upon the world, including the United States of America, he will realize inevitably before a very long time that the power of an aroused people fighting for their rights and for their soil is invincible, and will be triumphant over the forces of those men who are lashed like galley slaves to the ranks of war. I do not believe there is any heart in the rank and file of the German Army. They are driven under a policy of that same fearfulness which they sought by submarine warfare and by atrocities to put upon us. They know that if they do not fight they will die anyhow, so they move as a machine would move, under the direction of the military caste.

But inevitably a warfare conducted for selfish purpose must yield before a land and before a people bent upon preserving their own territory undefiled, bent upon maintaining their rights which are theirs by law divine, the enjoyment of their own homes and of their own political independence won so dearly by sacrifice in the past.

It was a general going to battle who said, "Oh, Lord, be neutral. If we are sinners, they are not saints." And if the Lord will only remain neutral there is no doubt whatever about the triumph of Franco-American forces.

I do not believe that there is a partnership between the Kaiser and God, although he has said so; but he has said many things that are not true; he has signed many treaties, and his word is of no worth and value. [Applause.]

They say that the lowest form of honor is commercial honor, which you people here all understand. It is an honor between men buying and selling, and you know that anyone who violates his word, although not written—the spoken word—is a pariah and an outcast. He might as well give up business, as there can be no business, no credit, no confidence, without honor. And so commercial honor is not only a sacred thing but is a necessary thing. But the Kaiser has not even got commercial honor. He lacks practical sense. It would be good business for him to respect his own obligations, but he and his ancestors from Frederick the Great down have regarded treaties as of no value, and have violated them at will, relying upon superior force; and he comes into an enlightened world with principles of that kind and seeks domination! He sought in America the winning of public opinion by a most subtle and corrupt propaganda. He went into our cities and towns and purchased organs of light and leading. He corrupted public men so far as he was able, but his ability to do that has been singularly poor in results, because no one has been accused in this country of having betrayed the cause in which we are engaged. I do not believe a public man has been involved in any scandal, which is highly creditable to the morals of our people. But he has invaded the offices of newspapers, as evidenced the other day in the matter of the Evening Mail, of New York, purchased outright for the very object of polluting and poisoning the sources of public opinion. How did we meet that?

I have been asked if life in Washington is agreeable. Not always, I should say. We have been obliged, by reason of the character of warfare, to adopt methods which, to say it mildly, strain the Constitution, which is the charter of our liberties. We have put restrictions upon trade, upon the habits and the lives of people; we have put restrictions upon the liberty of the press and the freedom of speech. And all this is made necessary by that insidious propaganda to which I referred, where men are hired to pervert public opinion and create defection. Sometimes it is in the form of pacifism, where men declare that they are opposed to war at any time and for any purpose. And they say, "That is our principle." There is always a grave doubt in cases of that kind whether or not they have been induced by somebody to take that stand. And when they take measures by speech or print to discourage men from entering our Army to meet the overwhelming danger which confronts them, then it is safe to say that they have been induced improperly to take that stand.

The American people are of one mind. They do not want war, they want peace; but they do not want peace on the terms proposed by the Kaiser, whereby America will be a vassal State. We want peace with our honor unstained. We want peace with our institutions intact, with our freedom and our rights unimpaired, owing homage to no foreign State whatever. We want, in the words of our leader, "the reign of law with the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind." And the President has proclaimed it from the housetops that he is willing, as a result of this war, to see that every other nation enjoys the same immunity from interference, enjoys its independence, its domestic rights and privileges and property, and that there is no selfish purpose whatever in the campaign of the allies, except to maintain the status quo and to hold on to that which has been won so dearly for us by the heroes and martyrs of the past. We can not surrender it. We shall not yield.

No one underestimtes the power of the military machine of Germany, but Germany seems to have either underestimated the resources of America or believed that it would be impossible to make those resources available. We are now sending men over to the other side at the rate of 100,000 a week. We have over a million men there now. We have defied the submarine warfare, which has utterly failed. No outgoing transport has been torpedoed. It is a most phenomenal thing, reflecting enormous credit upon our administrators, men of all parties and of all ranks, drawn to service in Washington. The whole country has been organized, and as one man we are moving for the accomplishment of a common purpose. It is impossible to believe for a moment that we shall fail. Our resources are so great, in combination with those of our allies, that it is only a matter of time, and we all pray that that time shall soon come, when the horrors of war shall only be a recollection of the past.

But we are making every sacrifice. We are willing to give, and have given, our sons, not to speak of our means. We have actually given up our cherished ideals in restraining the press and speech, restraining the trade of our merchants, imposing burdens almost too heavy to bear; but these are the sacrifices we are making, and willingly make.

In Washington now they are devising a measure of taxation which will be additionally burdensome, but you understand it. Nobody wishes to impose a burden upon the American people—certainly not its own Congress—and it is only the stern necessity of the occasion that requires this to be done. And when you make your payments, although it probably hampers you in your business and curtails you in your domestic relations, do it as a part of the sacrifice, and you will easily reconcile yourself to it when you think that there are a million Americans over there ready and willing to give up their lives, while you are only asked to give up your comfort and your accumulations.

We must prepare for the future war period by training our men—I think we will have to come to that—so that we will always have a great potential army in case the peace of the world is disturbed. [Applause.]

And our merchants must tighten their lines and look out for the preservation and enlargement of our trade. Now, that does not mean the asserting of world dominion, although we will probably have in our hands that power. If we thought on the lines of Nietzsche, Bernhardi, and the Kaiser we would exercise such power. "It is a splendid thing to have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant." We will have 30,000,000 tons of merchant shipping. We will have a Navy unparalleled. In the State of California the Federal Government is spending to-day $500,000,000 in building merchant ships and naval vessels. And that is what gives us the appearance of prosperity, because this money is being circulated and the workers are receiving it in large measure. And in that regard our community is more fortunate than other communities, where they are not spending Federal money for great public works. But we must look out for our trade and get a share of it by the education of our boys in the methods of trade and seamanship. Commerce is vitally necessary for national prosperity, but you can not have a conversation by doing all the talking yourself. You must allow the other fellow his share of that commerce. France can produce some things better than we can. Australia can produce some things better than we can. England can manufacture certain goods better than we can, and so Italy. And when the time comes to sit around the council board, if there be such a council on such a subject—and, indeed, Lord Robert Cecil, of the British House of Commons, has announced that 24 nations are now in alliance to sit around the council board and distribute, as it were, the commerce of the world—we must be ready to act. We have to go in with the same spirit of fraternal feeling, standing by our allies, as far as possible, in order that they may recuperate from their overwhelming losses, countries less resourceful than ours.

We have already advanced them vast sums of money. Selfishly, even, we are interested in the recovery by them of their trade and business. And so the world will be better off. There will be a better understanding and less fierce will be the rivalry, and certainly we will see to it that no rivalry shall so go out of bounds as to precipitate war. People have gone to war to get more business and to get more territory. Under the plan of our President that is barred. And he says, as I repeated before, that Germany will only be admitted to that council, sharing the trade of the world, when she has disciplined her Government; when the people, as the base in this country and in France, must tell the so-called rulers what the policy shall be, and that no longer shall decrees come down from the Kaiser, who claims his authority from God. His is a reversal of democracy, and that inverted cone must return to its rightful position and rest upon its base. Now it is standing upon its apex, and necessarily it is bound to topple over and fall. So we will have scotched the Kaiser; we will have reestablished democracy, the rule of the people, from the base up, when we have won this war, and then, in that event, if Germany conforms she will be admitted to this council of nations. That is the President's program. It is a just program. The only thing in the world is justice. The strong can take everything by force. They could do it in our community were there not courts. Why should not there be an international court to curb the greed and avarice of the strong? Why should not we have ideas—American, French, and English—forcibly antagonistic and overwhelming to the Kaiser's idea that only the strong are entitled to anything and only those who are the strong are entitled to survive? That is a damnable doctrine. Furthermore, it would eliminate most of us. I could not stand up for a minute beside some of those giants of physical strength. I have no respect for their physical strength. They must have good reason for their arguments. You will reason and argue a thing out in a court on lines of justice with even your most hated competitor, but what you want is justice. You do not want to be overthrown either by physical force or by corruption. In this country I think we have driven corruption out of public life. I think we are singularly free in this generation from any accusation of that kind, and that a man has a fair chance now in the courts, and he certainly should not be the victim of force—and is not. Nor should he be held up. And by the expansion of that idea we will find something approaching the millenium, but a practical Utopia, something well within our reach. Human society was once one of force in the days of the cave man. It is now orderly and organized. The very same thing can be done by willing nations, and, as Lord Robert Cecil says, this war has brought 24 of the great nations of the world together for the purpose of organizing to protect themselves against the wild attacks of madmen among the nations who, as soon as they show their poisonous purpose, shall be impounded and destroyed. [Applause.]

I am glad to say in closing that the world's liberty is safe, because liberty has been so thoroughly ingrained in the Anglo-Saxon, American, French, Italian, and Celt peoples that it can not be eradicated.

I love to quote Edward Dickinson Baker, who, after he went from California and Oregon to the Senate, said, at a time when people were scoffing at freedom during the Civil War:

> I rejoice in her power. I march beneath her banner. I glory in her strength. I have seen her stricken down on a hundred chosen fields of battle. I have seen her friends flee from her. I have seen her enemies gather around her and I have seen them bind her to the stake. I have seen them gather her ashes that they might scatter them farther yet, but when they turned to exult I have seen her meet them again face to face, full clad in complete steel and brandishing in her strong right arm a sword red with insufferable light.

She is indestructible. And that is why I believe and you believe that there is no danger in this world to-day from an autocrat, however strong, to eliminate American ideas and French and English ideas. It can not be done. He may temporarily gain his point; he may temporarily create the impression of victory; friends may flee away, as described by Baker, and the cause appear to be abandoned; but inevitably, because it is born in the human breast, the light of independence and liberty will flare up again and again until it ultimately triumphs. So the autocrat on his throne is not safe, no matter how he may be panoplied in power against that spirit of liberty. And that is just what the Kaiser is fighting. We have seen him drive back the gallant French at the Marne, but we have seen old Joffre, emulating Charles Martel and Theodoric, saving civilization at the Marne by holding fast against the incursions of the Hun. And now we see the great Foch, with Pershing by his side, driving the Huns far beyond. [Applause.]

And, suffering France, thou art not conquered. "Beauty's ensign yet is crimson in thy lips and in thy cheeks, and death's pale flag is not advanced there!"

Here is the tricolor, the same colors as our own. We are as one people, our flag is one, the Red, White, and Blue.

Then—

> Here's to the red of it,
> Precious blood shed for it;
> Here's to the white of it,
> All know the right of it;
> Here's to the blue of it,
> Heavenly hue of it;
> Here's to the whole of it,
> Stars, stripes, and pole of it;
> Here's to the roul of it,
> Red, white, and blue.

GIFT OF THE GOVERNMENT OF FRANCE (S. DOC. NO. 276).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, together with a letter from the ambassador from France to the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request of the French Ambassador I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a letter from the ambassador expressing the desire of his Government to offer to each of the two Houses of Congress a vase from the National Manufacture of Sevres.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 11 September, 1918.

AMBASSADE DA LA RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE
AUX ÉTATS-UNIS,
Washington, le September 9, 1918.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Anxious to show their profound appreciation of the way in which Congress received the Viviani-Joffre mission when it came to express France's sisterly gratitude for America's timely help, my Government is desirous, if so allowed, to offer to each of the two Houses a vase from our National Manufacture of Sevres.

Our hope is that those products of French craftsmanship may be kindly accepted and preserved as a token of what France feels toward the representatives of the American States and citizens, whose manly resolutions, suggested by yourself, each of them meeting the country's warmest approval, will have had such a decisive influence on the severest conflict, and the greatest by its consequences, the world has ever known.

I should be very much obliged to you if you were so good as to inform the Senate and the House of Representatives of the intention of the Government of the French Republic and of its motives.

I have the honor to be, dear Mr. President,
Very respectfully and sincerely, yours,

JUSSERAND.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message and accompanying letter will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

REPORT OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Joint Committee on Printing what has been done, if anything, with reference to the printing of the report of the Federal Trade Commission which was submitted some weeks ago.

Mr. SMOOT. The chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing is not in the Chamber, but I will say to the Senator from Idaho that up to the present time there has not been a meeting of the joint committee.

Mr. BORAH. There are a great many calls for this report and I am very anxious to have some action taken with regard to printing it. We have put into the RECORD replies to the report and criticisms on the report and there is no report printed. It is a matter that I think ought to have the attention of the committee. Does the Senator contemplate a meeting of the commitee very soon?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator there should be a meeting about Friday or Saturday of this week, and I think there will be one held.

Mr. BORAH. I presume it will be taken up at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; at the first meeting of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if the report was not printed in the RECORD. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that it had been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. I have never seen it in the RECORD, and I do not think it has been printed in the RECORD. The Senator from Utah is in error, I think, with regard to that.

Mr. SMOOT. It was printed in the House proceedings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Federal Trade Commission report was printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, as I said before, it was printed in the RECORD in the House proceedings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. The report which was made to the President?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the same report which the Senator from Idaho offered to have printed as a public document was printed in the proceedings of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report contains an account of the salaries paid certain directors of the American Metals Co.

Mr. NORRIS. No; that is not the report.

Mr. BORAH. That is not the report. The report about which I am making inquiry was made to the President. The report which came in in response to the resolution offered by myself was printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the one the Chair referred to.

Mr. BORAH. The report in response to the President's request, I am informed, has not been printed in the RECORD. I have never seen it.

CREDITS AND ADVANCES TO INDUSTRIES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to secure unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4855, which passed the Senate as an amendment to the Agricultural bill, but apparently the prospects are that some time will probably elapse before the Agricultural bill becomes a law. The situation which this bill was designed to meet is of very urgent character, and I should, therefore, like to get the Senate to pass the bill, so that it may travel along as rapidly as possible and perhaps become a law before the Agricultural bill may become a law. I see no objection to that course being pursued. I was authorized by the Finance Committee to report the bill favorably, and I hope there will be no objection to its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4855) to amend an act approved April 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, on page 2, line 7, after the words "live stock," to strike out "having, in either case, a maturity of not exceeding 12 months," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso to paragraph 2, section 7, of the act approved April 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Provided, That every such advance shall be secured in the manner described in the preceding part of this section, and (except in the case of an advance secured by a loan for agricultural purposes or a loan based on live stock) in addition thereto by collateral security, to be furnished by the bank, banker, or trust company of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of a value at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation), equal to at least 33 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will explain that in the case of the confirmation of certain young naval officers who are about to sail from this country some errors or inaccuracies occurred, and it is very desirable that those errors should be corrected, in order that those officers may receive their commissions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MINERAL PRODUCTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business having been concluded, the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] desires that the Senate shall begin the consideration of House bill 11259. He told me at the close of the morning business, before the executive session, that he intended to call up that bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the bill, which is the unfinished business, be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have several amendments which I desire to suggest to the bill under consideration, as to which I have conferred with the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge, and which, I think, will not be objected to, as they are simply intended to perfect and, as I understand, to make clear and to carry out the intention of the committee reporting the bill. The first amendment which I desire to offer, and which I send to the desk, is to section 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 21, line 16, before the word "enter" and after the word "to," it is proposed to insert the words "purchase such necessaries and to," so that, if amended, it will read:

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase such necessaries and to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign—

And so forth.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the object of that amendment is simply to allow the President the power to purchase. Under the provision as it stands the President simply has power to enter into contracts for purchase.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see no objection to the amendment to the amendment. It seems to me that the amendment is very appropriate and well drawn.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico what is the necessity of this proposed amendment? As I understand, the various war activities or other departments of the Government which may require any of the necessaries mentioned in the bill for governmental purposes would now be authorized to purchase them. Does the Senator from New Mexico desire to give additional powers and to permit the executive departments to engage in the buying and selling of any of the necessaries herein provided for?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, possibly I should have gone further in my opening remarks and explained my personal position more fully. I do object, under any ordinary circumstances whatsoever, to the Government of the United States entering into private business and buying and selling anything whatsoever. Of course the Government has the power and has the right through its proper officers to purchase any governmental necessities, anything which is necessary for the support of the Army or the Navy or any of the forces of the United States. Under any ordinary circumstances, I would as strenuously as any other Member of the Senate fight any proposition allowing the Government of the United States to go into the general mercantile and trading business, which is exactly what this bill does along certain lines. However, the purpose of the bill is good; there is no question about that, and it is presented here as a war necessity. It may be absolutely necessary that the Government should not only have the right to purchase for itself the minerals actually needed, but, to assist the Government in that purpose, that it should have the right to purchase the ores or the minerals, and then to allocate them to different private individuals by sale. It is necessary for the Government to have the power to dispose of these minerals and substances so purchased by sale to private individuals. Adopting that as the line suggested by the committee, and upon which they ask the Senate to legislate, I have simply devoted myself to an attempt to so word the bill by a few changes as to carry out and restrict that purpose. It is almost impossible for me to explain the proposition which I have in mind fully until all the various amendments I have in mind have been offered.

I will call the attention of the Senator to section 2 of the bill. If it is amended by the Senate, as I propose to amend it, it will then read:

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase such necessaries and to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the purchase of same, to provide storage facilities for and store the same, to provide or improve transportation facilities, and to use, distribute, or allocate said necessaries, or to sell the same at reasonable prices above the purchase or production cost thereof.

I shall offer that amendment following the word "prices," so that the Government will be restricted in offering for sale any such mineral or mineral products to a sum above the cost, or, in other words——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico rose.

Mr. FALL. I will yield in just a moment, if my colleague will allow me to explain the amendment. So that the Government would not be in a position where, through its taxing power, it could waive all costs and sell mineral products at a lower price than it would be possible for the individual engaged in the production to sell the same at. Otherwise, of course, without limitation of this kind, there would be an instrument placed in the hands of the Government through which the Government could monopolize the purchase or sale of every ounce of minerals mentioned in this bill. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wanted to suggest an amendment to the amendment just offered by my colleague—where he has "above the purchase or production cost thereof," to insert the word "average"—for this reason:

It is contemplated that as to certain of these metals, and perhaps a great many of them, the Government will buy at different prices, depending upon the cost of transportation and other factors; and it was in the contemplation of some of us who were connected with the framing of the bill that the Government should have the power to buy at different prices, and then sell to the industries using the metals at the average cost or at an average reasonable cost. I think that meets with the idea which my colleague has suggested, but would give the latitude which I think ought to be permitted.

Mr. FALL. I think possibly we might get together, then, by striking out the word "above," which is in the amendment which I have not yet offered, but which I intend to offer, and saying "at not less than the purchase or production cost thereof." I do not think my object, at any rate, would be achieved by allowing the Government to purchase manganese at so much per ton and radium at so much per gram and then taking the cost price of the minerals between manganese upon the one extreme and radium upon the other to average the price, because that would put all the producers of clay and of every other material out of business.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am quite certain we are both thinking along the same lines and want to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. FALL. I think so. The first amendment has not yet been adopted, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the senior and the junior Senators from New Mexico to this proposition to see whether or not we are prepared to accept what I regard as a very radical departure from the ordinary methods, not only of doing business by private individuals, but the ordinary methods of doing business on the part of the Government.

As I understand the suggestion of the junior Senator from New Mexico, not only made this morning but very strikingly presented when this bill was under consideration a day or two ago, the idea is to enable the Government to pay to one producer of manganese or any article mentioned in this bill a given price and to another producer of the same article an entirely different price, and then the amendment of the Senator will be to average, in the sale of the article, the high and the low price paid to those two individuals. Now, do the Senators think—and I ask this question of both the Senators from New Mexico—that that is the only way in which we can practically handle the proposition, namely, to authorize some instrumentality of the Government to pay different prices to different individuals for the same product and then to put all of those prices, so to speak, into one class and then strike an average and sell upon that average?

It seems to me that is a very dangerous plan to pursue in handling the business of the country. It permits the Government to pay an enormous price to A because his business is unprofitable or because he labors under disadvantages in producing the article and to pay only a reasonable price to B. A might get $150,000 a gram for radium because it was difficult for him to produce it; B might get only $10,000 a gram because he is geographically so situated as to be able to produce it very cheaply.

Has the Senator thought of the problem that is presented in handling the public business in this way?

Mr. FALL. I had offered exactly that objection in answer to the suggestion of my colleague, who is assisting in placing the bill before the Senate, and for that reason I stated before offering it, before the first amendment was disposed of, that I should offer an amendment, to follow the word "prices," in line 21, that the Government should not dispose of any of these products so bought by it for anything less, at any rate, than the cost price to the Government of the product, which would prevent the Government absolutely monopolizing the product by averaging the prices and doing away with the individual barter and trade in like products.

I have finally forced myself into the condition of mind where I will agree that if it is necessary for the Government to have these extreme powers of a trading company, as a war measure, I will vote for it; but I do not want to destroy all individual initiative or competition. I think, if I may be allowed to express my views a little beyond the present measure, that this Government would be in a great deal better business if it were offering inducements for the initiative of the individual, rather than through insidious methods, continually insisting upon going into competition with the individual itself, and necessarily taking over, sooner or later, all business in the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator know whether the committee has gone over with the heads of the departments or Cabinet officials these various metals and products, so as to know whether it is necessary to have this power to produce these identical things; or is this a catch-all, put in here to take in everything they can think of?

For instance, I notice here sodium and potassium. We have already provided by legislation for them. How many more things are there here that we have provided for, or that are not necessary?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, without assuming to answer for the committee, I think I can say that they have gone over the list of these minerals with the heads of the departments; and if the Senator will examine the House bill he will discover that the Senate committee has excluded from the list a very large number of minerals which were inserted in the House bill. I want to say that in my judgment the Senate committee has not only worked very faithfully, but has finally arrived at a compromise such as I can force myself to accept, when I never could have supported anything along the lines of the original House bill at all. I think the committee has done its best; but it is impossible for individual Senators to understand what work they have done and what they are willing to agree to do now in strengthening their work, unless we take up the entire bill and see what it means. If it is necessary, I will go through it first, without offering the amendments which I propose to offer, with the permission of the members of the committee, and undertake to explain it as I go along.

First, Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is to allow the Government of the United States to trade in the minerals mentioned here. It is said that it is necessary for the Government of the United States to have that power of purchase and sale and contract, so that they may make a contract, for instance, two years ahead, justifying the producer of these minerals or the miner or the prospector producing the ores in devoting his time to the production, with the knowledge that he will receive a remunerative price for the product, and that it will not be subject to monopoly at the hands of private individuals, through which, after expending great time and large amounts of money, he might find himself in the situation that has resulted in the case of the molybdenum production, for instance, and in the production of one or two other minerals. I refer to cases where, stimulated by a great price, miners have invested thousands of dollars not only in opening up the ore bodies and producing the minerals themselves, but also in erecting reduction plants for reducing the minerals, for concentrating, or for reduction in other ways, and then have found that the price has slumped 100 or 200 or 300 per cent, and that it was impossible for them to pursue the industry. There are wrecks of such mining enterprises now in the States of Arizona, New Mexico, and other of the mining States of the Rocky Mountain region.

These are the facts: The committee has undoubtedly sought to avoid exactly that result as it is now and may be through the monopolization of the production by a few individuals, by allowing the Government to offer inducements to these miners and prospectors, or the smelter or reduction men, or capitalists, who must put their money in before the minerals can be produced, allowing them a price which will justify them in continuing their production and reduction of the minerals. Now, this is the object of the bill. It has been thought best by the committee to give the Government trading power to enable them to do that, because otherwise they would not have the power to allocate to the different individual enterprises in this country the proportionate amount, for instance, of manganese or of other minerals which would be necessary for the continuous operation of such private enterprises. In other words, the Government in taking over the mineral will see that through no individual monopoly shall one firm or corporation or aggregation of firms or corporations secure the advantage, and put out of business the others. Under ordinary circumstances, I am as bitterly opposed to the general principle of the bill as any Member of the Senate could be—that is, that the Government should become an ordinary trading enterprise.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, if that is the object of the bill, of course I shall not object; but take manganese: I am informed—I do not know whether the information is correct or not—that since the war broke out, and the necessity has arisen, we are now producing enough manganese in this country, and that it will not be necessary to import much more, if any more. As I say, I do not know whether that is correct or not.

Mr. FALL. I do not think that is entirely correct. The production of manganese has very largely increased in this country; there is no question of that; but we are still dependent to some extent on Brazilian manganese, and the very fact that a delegation from a certain other South American country is here now, engaged in an attempt to make a commercial treaty with this country, speaks for itself. If the Senator will look into the matter, I think he will find that the manganese mines of Uruguay are being considered at this time. I do not think we have yet arrived at the point where we produce anything like enough manganese in this country.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the evidence before the committee is that we have not yet nearly reached the point where we produce all the manganese that we require, but that the supply is increasing quite rapidly; and it is hoped that in a short time we may be producing all that we require. As I say, however, that point has not yet been reached, by considerable; and one of the very important purposes of this bill is to assure an ample supply of manganese.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, to reiterate what I have said, the purpose of section 2 of the bill is to allow the Government of the United States not only to go into the open market and purchase but to allocate and sell the goods purchased to individuals, and also to allow the Government to enter into long-time contracts which will stimulate such production and guarantee the producer against loss. This is the purpose, generally speaking, of section 2; and I have simply sought to amend it in words, to make it—as I thought, and as I think, the committee agree—convey the meaning of the committee a little more clearly. Therefore the next amendment which I should offer would be to strike out the word "necessaries," on line 17, page 21, and insert the words "the same," and then to follow that by inserting, after the word "prices" and before the colon, on line 21, the words "not less than the purchase or production cost thereof." I shall offer those amendments at the proper time.

Section 3 is the section which undoubtedly caused the committee more thought than any other portion of the bill, and one which gave me more trouble than any other in my consideration of it, because, in my judgment, it is the most important part of the bill. Section 3 was intended to give the President authority to requisition and take over any of these minerals, and then to take over any lands or deposits of such minerals which were idle, and then to take over any plants of any kind or character for the reduction of such ores and the production of such minerals as were not being operated or were being only partially operated, so that he might commandeer and take over the plants, take over the idle mines and deposits, and might then also requisition the minerals, at a price to be fixed by him, when he saw fit, and if it were necessary.

I shall offer amendments to section 3 as follows:

On page 22 to strike out, after the word "necessaries," down to and including the word "same" on line 17—in other words, to strike out "to provide storage facilities for and to store the same"—because exactly that power is given a little farther along in the same section. The words "and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same" would be left in; likewise the words "and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped." After the word "undeveloped" insert the word "or," so as to read "undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated." Strike out the word "or," in line 20, the first word in the line, so as to read "insufficiently developed or operated idle land." Strike out the word "or" after "land" and insert a comma, and insert the word "or" between the words "deposit" and "mine," so as to read "deposit or mine." Following the word "mine" insert the words "and any idle or partially operated," so that it would read "deposit or mine, and any idle or partially operated smelter, or plant, or part thereof, producing or, in his judgment, capable of producing said necessaries, and to develop and operate." Strike out the words "the same" and insert the words "such mine or deposit and such smelter or plant." Then the committee amendment proceeds "either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement, or in any other manner, and to store, use, distribute, allocate, or sell the products thereof." After the word "thereof," line 1, page 23, is the principal amendment, which I think should be adopted, in the nature of a proviso, and which I shall offer:

Provided, That no ores or metals, the principal money value of which consists in metals or minerals other than those specifically enumerated in section 1 hereof, shall be subject to requisition under the provisions of this act.

That practically completes the suggestions which I would have to offer to the bill, with the exception——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will allow me to make one further statement, I will yield. With the exception that unless there should be stricken from the next paragraph of section 3 all power of any kind or character to regulate wages, there should be adopted certain words which would make it plain and clear as to what wages might be regulated by the Government. Therefore I have prepared an amendment after the word "thereof," on line 25, page 23, to insert the words "so requisitioned or taken over," striking out "articles or substances" and inserting the word "necessaries," so that it would apply generally to articles or substances used directly. It would read:

Of necessaries used, manufactured, produced, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees.

After the word "employees" and before the period I would insert the words "therein or thereupon," so that it would be perfectly clear that the Government would not have the power to regulate the wages of employees in these mining industries generally, but only the power, which, of course, would necessarily follow even without this provision, to regulate the wages in the commandeered or requisitioned plants or mines. I now yield to the Senator from Montana. I will yield the floor, simply offering the amendments.

Mr. WALSH. I was about to suggest to the Senator that the expression "partially operate" a smelter would not be a very definite term.

Mr. FALL. No.

Mr. WALSH. I rather imagine the Senator did not intend to authorize the commandeering of a smelter that was in operation but not operated to its full capacity.

Mr. FALL. I was simply attempting, I may say to the Senator, to make a little more clear the language of the bill, and my purpose was to change it just as little as possible. However, smelters, as the Senator knows, as well as concentration and other reduction plants, are often built in units. Now, suppose the private operator is only operating one unit, for instance, of a half dozen units of a concentrating plant, and many of these ores are treated by concentration. Suppose the President finds that there is a capacity for the treatment of a thousand tons of ore per day of antimony or of other minerals, and that the unit in use by the owners will only treat 100 tons, should he stand and allow the 900 tons to go untreated or be compelled to provide through the appropriation here for the construction of a smelter or a concentrating plant with a capacity to treat the 900 tons per day, when the plant is there lying idle or only partially operated?

Mr. WALSH. I can suggest to the Senator another condition. Not entirely in separate units, not capable of utilization as a distinct entity, a man might be operating a dozen furnaces. The owner for his own purpose would be operating only nine of them, or he might be operating ten or allow one to lie idle. The bill with the amendment suggested by the Senator would authorize the Government to take them over.

Mr. FALL. Of course, it is almost impossible to word a general law so that it will cover and specifically care for every particular case. I assume that Mr. Baruch or the Bureau of Mines or whoever administers the law would not take over nine-tenths of the unit because one-tenth was lying idle, but would simply say to the operators, "We will furnish you with the ore, if you have it not; we will furnish you by priority orders with the coke necessary for you to operate, and if you do not accept this proposition then we will be compelled to take over the other units and operate them." It would conduce to economy, and possibly that may be the economy referred to by the Secretary of the Interior in the letter upon the table.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana, if the Senator from New Mexico will pardon me, if the construction which he places upon the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Mexico would not be applicable to the bill as it is drawn; that is to say, under the bill would not the President or the instrumentality selected for the exigencies of this act when it shall be enacted into law have the authority to requisition a smelter that was not in operation? I was wondering, if the Senator was offering a criticism upon the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Mexico because it permitted the requisition of a smelter that was not in operation, whether the same criticism would not apply to the bill itself.

Mr. WALSH. I dare say the words "insufficiently operated" would cover it.

Mr. FALL. Those words would be stricken out if my amendment were adopted. Any "idle or partially operated smelter" would be the wording of the section if my amendment were adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Those are qualifying words.

Mr. FALL. The "insufficiently operated" would only apply to mineral deposits and the "partially operated" would apply to smelters.

I proceed in order then, having made this explanation to offer the amendments. The first amendment I believe is pending.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is that amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 21, line 16, before the word "enter" and after the word "to" insert "purchase such necessaries and to."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. In line 17 I move to strike out the word "necessaries" and insert in lieu thereof the word "same."

The SECRETARY. In line 17, page 21, strike out the word "necessaries" and insert the word "same," so that if amended it will read:

That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase such necessaries and to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of same.

Mr. FALL. That is simply to make it comply with the amendment already adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. After the word "prices," and before the colon, in line 21, I move to insert the words "at not less than the purchase cost or production cost thereof."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not suppose there will be any immediate reason why that could not be done. I may, however, suggest that at the conclusion of the war the Government may have on hand some of these minerals which can not then be sold for such prices. Might we not leave it as it is worded in the bill and say "reasonable prices"?

Mr. FALL. I could not agree, as far as I am concerned, to leave it "reasonable prices," because that puts the Government in precisely——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am willing to accept the amendment presented by my colleague. We can take care of the after-war situation when it comes.

Mr. FALL. Congress can see to that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If it thinks best to do so.

Mr. FALL. I very much fear the result unless you do provide that the Government shall not have, through its power to raise funds, the power to produce minerals to its advantage in the market and put every individual producer out of business.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The purpose of my colleague is highly commendable, and I agree to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 21, after the words "reasonable prices" insert the words "at not less than the purchase cost or production cost thereof."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. In section 3, page 22, after the word "necessaries," in line 16, I move to strike out the comma and the words "to provide storage facilities for and to store the same."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. It is there in two or three places, I will say to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. In line 19, after the word "undeveloped," I move to strike out the comma and insert the word "or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. I move to strike out the first word "or," in line 20.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. I move to strike out the word "or" between the word "land" and the word "deposit" in line 20.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. After the word "deposit" I move to insert the word "or," and after the word "mine" to insert the words "and any idle or partially operated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. I wanted to suggest to the committee that where they have used the words "smelter or plant" we ordinarily in mining terms use the term "or other reduction plant," but I do not offer that as an amendment. It is simply a suggestion to the committee in case the committee thinks best to make the amendment.

In lines 22 and 23 I move to strike out the words "the same," and in lieu of such words to insert: "such mine or deposit and such smelter or plant."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the Secretary report that amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, beginning with the word "the," at the end of line 22, strike out "the same" and insert "such mine or deposit and such smelter or plant."

Mr. FALL. I should like to modify that by striking out the word "and" after the word "deposit," and before the word "such" and insert "or," so as to read:

And to develop and operate such mine or deposit or such smelter or plant, either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood the Senator from New Mexico had an amendment to offer on page 22, line 22, after the word "necessaries" by inserting "or either of them."

Mr. FALL. I thank the Senator for reminding me of that. After the word "necessaries," in line 22, I move to insert the words "or either of them."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. The next amendment is, after the word "thereof," in line 1, page 23, to insert a proviso.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 1, after the word "thereof," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no ores or metals the principal money value of which consists in metals or minerals other than those specifically enumerated in section 1 hereof shall be subject to requisition under the provisions of this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. I think the chairman of the committee having in charge the bill has some amendments to the next paragraph, on the same page or on the following page. I will only suggest at the present moment that on page 24, line 1, the words "articles or substances" be stricken out and the word "necessaries" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before that is reached I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. FALL. I have another amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is right at this point that the amendment I desire to offer comes in.

Mr. FALL. I understand, but I thought the chairman had a general amendment to it. If there are to be any other amendments to be offered now, I have another amendment that I will offer, coming before this present amendment.

On page 23, after the word "thereof," in line 25, I move to insert the words "so requisitioned or taken over and."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. The words "articles and substances" should be stricken out and the word "necessaries" inserted in lieu thereof, because it is evidently the intention of the committee to confine the materials to those mentioned specifically in the bill, which are covered by the generic term "necessaries."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 1, strike out the words "articles or substances" and in lieu insert "necessaries."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. On page 24, after the word "employees," in line 3, and before the period, I move to insert the words "therein or thereupon."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, that concludes the amendments I desire to offer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, to be inserted on page 23, line 1. I desire that it should be placed after the word "thereof"; but if the proviso of the Senator from New Mexico has been inserted, it would come after that. The amendment which I offer reads:

There shall be established such headquarters and offices for the administrative force authorized herein at such point west of the Missouri River as he may deem proper.

That is, the President, as it refers to the power of the President.

I want to say, Mr. President, that this will not only relieve, to some extent, at least, the congestion which exists in Washington by having so many employees located here—and, as I understand, there are 500 arriving every day—but the principal object in proposing the amendment is to have these officers in the part of the country where the miners may see them and talk with them, and not have to get on a train and travel two or three thousand miles in order to contract and agree with them.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Does not the Senator think it would be best to have his proposed amendment attached to section 5, which is the administrative section of the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thought the amendment should be inserted at the point where the authority is proposed to be conferred; but I have no objection to having the amendment placed at any point where it is appropriate—at the end of section 5, if necessary, and if that is the proper place for it.

Mr. FALL. That is the administrative proviso, and the Senator's amendment might come as an addition to that section.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. I move that the amendment be inserted at the end of line 6, on page 25.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wish the Senator would again state his amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The amendment I propose is to insert:

There shall be established such headquarters and offices for the administrative force authorized herein at such point west of the Missouri River as he may deem proper.

That is, as the President may deem proper.

Mr. President, I want to explain that amendment a little further before proceeding on another line. In the first place, the operation of this bill is going to be confined to the Rocky Mountain region; nine-tenths, yes, probably ninety-nine one-hundredths of that which is to be done in the way of execution of contracts, in the examination of mines, the taking over of mines and smelters, is going to have its base of operation in the Rocky Mountain Region, for there is located really the great mineral wealth of our country; that is where these minerals are found. A man of ordinary means may have a prospect which gives promise of the production of some of the metals; he may have a partially developed mine or he may have closed down his mine because of the fact that prices were not such as would justify him to work it. All of these things mean that those men are poor, that they can not afford to get on the train, come down to Washington, and probably spend weeks and weeks for the purpose of getting an agreement with the Government as to the taking over of their mines. For that reason it seems to me that the President ought to be authorized to designate some central place in the mining region, or, so far as that is concerned, several central places, because I think that there ought to be some way of administering this law economically. The only way it can be economically administered would be by having a central place, and then such subsidiary places as the department might deem best.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Would it not be better to have a branch of the service in each of the mining States?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know that that is necessary; but I am perfectly willing that that may be done if found to be needed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with what the Senator from Colorado suggests, if it should be necessary; but I am inclined to believe that what is intended to be accomplished by the amendment proposed by the Senator is now provided for in the bill. If the Senator will look at the language in lines 5 and 6, on page 25, he will find that it reads: "Both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I know, Mr. President, but we are continually lacking in the proper amount of activities in our western country, while Washington is overcrowded; so I think it would be better to adopt this amendment. It is not imperative upon the part of the Government or upon the part of the President to do this, but it would be a suggestion that Congress thought it was wise that some at least of the administrative offices should be located in the section of country where the miners are located, so that they could personally communicate and do business with the officers of the Government.

I have not any doubt that it would conduce to expedition; I have no doubt it would work to the benefit of all concerned. Take an ordinary miner, who probably has not a hundred dollars, but who has a prospect; he may have a mine which may develop into a very valuable property; he wants to present its merits to the Government, and the only means that he has of doing so is to sit down and write to the authorities. What can such a man describe in writing? Of course, that might work properly if the authorities took proper interest in the matter, but the chances are that there will be thousands of such cases. The manner in which a man talks to a Government employee, the manner in which he can tell him the facts of the case, is not the same as putting it in writing. All men are not gifted in the art of writing.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to have the headquarters close to the section of country where the mines are to be taken over or aided or assisted by the Government, or where contracts are to be made with relation to the production of the mines. I think this clause should be inserted at the point where the language reads: "Both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential."

It would be a suggestion to the President, at least, that would expedite the operation and secure more efficient working of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Committee on Mines and Mining has, in my opinion, performed a difficult task in an eminently satisfactory manner and is entitled to the thanks of the Senate and the country. There was referred to it a bill which had passed the House which was devoid of any redeeming features. Indeed, the measure called for the condemnation of the people. Instead of being a bill for the "national security and defense and to encourage the production and the conservation of ores, metals, and minerals," which it pretended to be, it was a measure which weakened the national security and obstructed the national defense, and discouraged production of ores, metals, and minerals, and also in its operations would have prevented the conservation of the same.

There is a class of people who entertain the view that the National Government must enter into all private concerns and control the domestic and business lives and activities of the people. This view finds expression in measures which occasionally find their way into both branches of Congress.

For a number of years there has been a propaganda carried on in the United States having for its object the withdrawal of all public mineral lands from entry by private persons. The scheme contemplated that the Government should either directly engage in mining operations, and, of course, in the smelting and reduction of the ores, or that it should establish a system of leasing under which the mineral lands should be worked.

The folly of any attempt by the Government to engage in the mining business is so obvious that it is incomprehensible how any rational person could entertain a view of that character. The experience of our Government, as well as other nations that have engaged in the leasing of mineral lands, ought to have been so illuminating as to successfully combat the efforts of the proponents of the leasing system. I regret to say that there have been and still are persons in official positions who have been and still are enthusiastic advocates of this obnoxious form of paternalism. Within a very recent period a very strong effort was made by the Interior Department to embark the Government upon the plan of working mining claims containing radium ores. The plan also contemplated the erection by the Government of the necessary works and plants for the reduction of the ores and the manufacture of the finished product. Certainly the evidence brought to our attention, the governmental inefficiency in business matters and in the conduct of the business affairs committed to its care, ought to lead the people, and certainly public officials, to a very careful scrutiny of measures which have for their object the embarkation of the Government upon the sea which has been properly and justly recognized as belonging to private endeavor. The Government has a broad field for the exercise of its legitimate functions. Our Nation is combating a system which has been developed under a school of thought that recognized the Government as omnipotent in all things, and which did not differentiate between the rights of the people and the powers and functions of the Government.

Germany has suffered from Prussian absolutism, from the theory that the Government has the right to engage in every line of industry and treat the individuals as mere pawns to be used for the Government's aggrandizement. Centralization of power in a monarch or in a bureaucracy means the stripping of the people of power, rights, and privileges inherent in them. The reign of democracy does not mean the triumph of bureaucracy or the consolidation of power in the hands of a limited few. There can be no democratization of a people without the possession by the people of power. It is important to keep in mind always the distinction between legitimate and proper governmental powers and the authority and rights reserved to the people. It is easy to find pretexts for depriving the masses of their liberties or invading in any way their reserved rights.

These observations are rather general in their character and may not be quite germane to the bill under consideration. They have been prompted by the House bill, which the measure reported by the Senate Committee on Mines and Mining is a substitute for, and by the clamor of some that the Federal Government shall ignore the States and the reserved powers of the people, strike down the police powers of the States, and take over not only the governmental functions of the States but also become the proprietor of the business enterprises and the industries of the people. Under some strange malady there are those who feel that the Government could run the factories, operate the mines and mills and smelters and the industries and enterprises that have made this a rich and mighty Nation, better than could the people themselves; and yet when we come into contact with the bureaus and departments of the Government we see the inefficiency, the enormous cost measured by the results, and the failure of the Government to handle business affairs with the same ability and success that characterize private individuals. It would be an unfortunate condition, in my mind, to have only one employer, and that the Government, and to have it the owner of all property, the determiner of the lives and callings of the people.

The House bill subjected the mining and smelting business of the country to the control of governmental agencies and bureaus. It provided for a comprehensive and destructive licensing system. It imposed pains and penalties that were vicious. It was altogether an unworthy, reactionary, and dangerous bill. The Senate bill which we are now considering gives ample evidence that it was drawn with broader vision and with a clearer recognition of the spirit and genius of our Government and the American people, and upon lines far more sane and progressive. Nevertheless, I regret that it was felt necessary that a measure of the character of the one under consideration should be reported.

I dislike to set up my judgment against the judgment of the members of the committee and those who have given so much thought and attention to this question. And it can be truthfully stated that those who have not participated in the hearings of the committee and are not familiar with the facts brought to the attention of the committee are not in a position to speak so authoritatively upon the question involved as the members of the committee. This bill proceeds upon the hypothesis that without some governmental interposition metals needed by the Government or in the production of the war necessities will not be available. The theory seems to be that because some rare metals have not been produced in the United States, but have been imported from foreign countries, they will not be available for use during the war unless the Government becomes interested in some fashion in their production.

No one denies the right or power or duty of the Government to acquire wherever possible whatever is necessary to prepare the Nation for its duties as a belligerent. The war, of course, must be won, and every power of the Government must be brought into play for the purpose of winning the war. If the Government requires ships, it is its duty to requisition ships where they can be found or to build them with all possible dispatch. If it lacks powder, it is its duty to procure it, and, if necessary, to build powder factories. If it needs sulphur, or graphite, or manganese, or any of the minerals or metals referred to in this bill, it possesses ample authority to make contracts for the purchase of the same. No one could criticize a measure that conferred upon the administration authority to buy whatever metals or minerals or other things that it needs in order to equip the Nation for this great undertaking, and by various bills the President and various departments and governmental agencies have been authorized to take possession of not only personal property but of real estate when needed for governmental purposes. There has been no hesitation upon the part of the legislative branch of the Government to give to the Executive ample authority to requisition whatever property was needed in the prosecution of the war. Nor has there been any withholding of appropriations for all such purposes. I have been inclined to the view that ample authority has been given to the executive branch of the Government to procure either or all of the metals described in this bill; that is, all that were necessary for governmental purposes.

And when I say for governmental purposes I mean not only such as would be used directly by the Government or some employer or some arm of the Government, but such as might be necessary by private individuals or corporations who were producing munitions or other supplies needed by the Nation. The Government now has the authority to go into the market and contract for any of the ores or minerals or metals described in this bill. In my opinion the President or agencies of the Government have the authority now to enter into contracts for the purchase of any of the necessaries described in section 1 of this bill if those necessaries are required by the Government or in the production of articles which the Government needs in the prosecution of the war.

The dangerous and disturbing feature of the bill is that which authorizes the Government to take over any undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated or idle land or deposit or mine, smelter, or plant and to develop and operate the same. As stated, the Government can acquire, in my opinion, all that our country can produce of the metals and minerals referred to by paying a suitable price therefor. We all know that the prices paid for some of these rare metals has increased very much during the past year and that the increase in the price has greatly increased production. Sulphur is mentioned in this bill. We know that a number of sulphur properties have been shut down for years because of the limited demand and the small price paid for the same. With increased demand and with a rising price many of these sulphur properties are being resuscitated and the output is being largely increased. The same is true of manganese. The demand for manganese ores has greatly increased because of the increased production of steel, particularly steel for ordnance purposes.

Because of our lack of shipping and the difficulty of securing manganese from Spain and other foreign countries attention has been attracted to the manganese deposits in our own country, and the result is that thousands of tons of manganese are now being produced in the United States where formerly only hundreds of tons were mined, and, if an adequate price is paid, the output of manganese ores will be sufficient within a very short time to meet all demands, not only of the Government but of the people of our country. Because the demand for tungsten has increased and the importations have decreased, already the result is the development of tungsten properties, and, with prices sufficiently high to justify increased production, there will be growing activity, and within a short time the needs of the Government and the people satisfied. High prices stimulate production in the products of men's genius and labor. There is no contention that these rare metals do not exist in the United States. Indeed, the theory of the bill is that they are to be found in our country, but that their development has been restricted and the output has been insufficient to meet current demands. The law of supply and demand has a field for operation in the matter of the metals under consideration. If these minerals and metals are in the United States and they can be produced, then it would seem that their production depends solely upon the question of the price of the same. If a price sufficiently high is paid for these metals, they can be procured. We all know that the history of our country has demonstrated that our mineral output has depended upon the demands of the people. No matter how limited the supply of lead or zinc or any other metal or mineral, if the price was sufficiently inviting to induce capital to engage in its production, then the necessary capital was forthcoming and the requirements of the people were met.

The view of Senators who have spoken in advocacy of this bill seems to be that without this or some similar measure of relief we can not procure the minerals and metals which the Government needs and which the people at this time require. As I have indicated, I do not share this view. In my opinion, if the Government or those who require these metals will state what is needed, they will have no difficulty in contracting for the required products, providing that they are willing to pay an adequate price therefor. The owners of sulphur, or radium, or tungsten, or graphite properties will develop the same if they are assured of a profitable market for their products.

Senators have stated that it was not the intention of the Government to operate mines and smelters, that the power conferred by section 3 would not be exercised except in some extreme cases.

As stated, I shall vote for this bill, but I shall do so reluctantly and with misgivings. I am afraid that it will prove a very expensive experiment and fail in the accomplishment of the beneficent results which are prophesied as the fruits of its enactment. I am so anxious that nothing shall be done to impede in any possible way the war work which our country is performing that I hesitate to withhold assent to measures which executive departments aver are contributory to the successful prosecution of the war. I can see that the enforcement of this bill along rational and conservative lines may be of some benefit. In the hands of unwise administrators or selfish or incompetent persons it could be made an engine of oppression as well as a breeder of confusion and discord.

The confidence that we have in the President, in his broad vision, and in his sagacious plans and policies, leads to the enactment of measures that in peace times would be regarded as extraordinary and startling in their nature. A confidence which we have exhibited so often, let me say in passing, is justified, and the wisdom and sagacity and greatness of the President become more apparent as the responsibilities placed upon him are multiplied.

I have found it difficult to adjust my views upon all occasions to the situation which the war presents. Withdrawn from the field of carnage and legislating here far removed from the sounds of shot and shell, it is not always easy to remember that this Nation is engaged in the greatest war that has ever visited the world. The Constitution of our Government contemplates that war will call for the exercise of powers upon the part of the Federal Government which may be regarded, in the absence of a better term, as dormant or latent. So there are many measures which the exigencies of the war demand and which would be repugnant to our views in times of peace that we are now called upon to consider. I appreciate that this is a war measure, and can be constitutionally supported as such. As stated, I shall support it, but with apprehensions as to the results, but with the sincere hope that it will be even more successful and beneficent than its most earnest champions anticipate.

Mr. President, one of the reasons compelling me to support this bill is the high character of the members of the committee reporting it and also my knowledge of the patriotic and intelligent investigation which they have conducted in order to ascertain the facts relating to the question with which it attempts to deal. The House bill, as I have indicated, was so imperfect, defective, and oppressive, it would, if enacted into law, have produced such baneful and destructive consequences, that it deserved condemnation and defeat. The provisions of this bill that are most obnoxious to me are those permitting leasing and also authorizing the Government to engage in mining and smelting and all of the pursuits connected with the production of the ores, minerals, and metals described in this bill. The progress of our Nation has been so great under the stimulus of our democratic form of government and the competitive system that I look with profound concern upon the enactment of policies that change so radically our economic and industrial life. I do not mean to express approval of all of the conditions that have attended our industrial growth. There have been evils which needed correction, and wrongs, particularly to labor, that the future must prevent; but I am persuaded that the destruction of private business and the taking over by the Government of the industries, activities, and business concerns of the people will prove the destruction of our democratic form of government, and materially retard the progress and development, economically, industrially, politically, and in every other way, of our Nation and the American people. It will paralyze the genius of the American people. It will produce an atrophied condition, an economic stupefaction, so serious and deadly as will drag our Nation from its high and splendid station.

There is nothing in what I have stated that is expressive of the view that the Government may not exercise proper and legitimate power, particularly over interstate commerce; nor do I want to be understood as contending that there may not be enterprises or concerns so clearly national and governmental in character as to justify their control and, indeed, ownership by the Federal Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to say to the Senator from Utah that I think every member of the committee in ordinary times would violently oppose any such legislation as is proposed in this bill, and it is only tendered as a war measure.

Mr. KING. As I have indicated, Mr. President, one of the serious objections to the bill is that which authorizes the agency or instrumentality created by this measure to take over and operate mines, mills, smelters, and all instrumentalities employed in the production of the metals and minerals mentioned in the bill. The administrative agency carrying out the terms of the measure will be subjected to pressure by the owners of idle mining properties or mines which never have and never can be operated at a profit. Unless there is the greatest vigilance and care employed, the Government will be subjected to heavy and irreparable losses. On the other hand, there will be the temptation upon the part of those enforcing the terms of the bill to increase their power and activities. The feeling will be that, backed by the Government, they can make unsuccessful mines, smelters, and mills paying and profitable ventures. It is human nature to seek to increase one's authority and power, and where the results would probably be beneficial if success were achieved, the inclination to exercise granted authority will be stronger. So, without in any way impugning the motives of those who may administer this bill, it, I think, can be said that there will be danger upon their part of engaging in the pursuits permitted by the bill and the following of a policy which will commit the Government to an invasion of the fields of private business, with consequent serious financial losses.

I concede the wisdom, and indeed the necessity, of the Government protecting itself as well as corporations and individuals engaged in producing ordnance and war munitions and other things required by the Government in the prosecution of the war, and for that purpose and to that end entering into contracts for the purchase of articles whether they be metals or woolen or leather products. And I think it would be not only justifiable but prudent to extend those contracts for such a period of time as would insure with certainty and definiteness whatever the Government imperatively needs. It would be prudent for the Government, if it requires either or all of the metals mentioned in this bill, to make contracts for the purchase of the same; and if, in order to obtain satisfactory terms, it became necessary to make the contracts for a period of one or two years, such a course would not only be warranted but demanded.

Nor can I see any impropriety in creating an agency or bureau for the purpose of acquiring the metals needed by the Government. It is not against policies of this character that I venture any criticism. It is when war measures are enacted that contemplate or authorize the Government engaging in purely private enterprises that I venture a most respectful dissent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am really very curious to know what the Senator would do in the circumstances. He is not a member of the committee, although we would have been very glad to have had his help; but now what would the Senator do? Take manganese, for instance. We are gathering the greater proportion of our supply of that ore from Brazil and have got to take ships that ought to be engaged in the transport service and send them to Brazil for manganese. We can not spare those ships; we need them for the transport service, and so we ought to get every pound of manganese ore that we can possibly secure in this country. How would the Senator do it?

Take pyrites. We bring enormous quantities of pyrites from Spain. They are utilized in the manufacture of sulphuric acid. It is a tremendous task to take ships from the work that we should like to have them engaged in, the carrying of troops and the carrying of supplies over to our men, and send them to Spain for pyrites in order that sulphuric acid may be produced for use in the manufacture of munitions. We have got to keep our steel manufactures going or we will not be able to make cannon or shells, and we have got to have the manganese. So on down the list. Take platinum, take chromium, take the whole list of these things, and we have got to have them. We are at war; these are not peace times; and what would the Senator do now in war conditions to keep going the industries of our country essential to the prosecution of the war?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the inquiry propounded by the Senator is a fair one. I think I have already answered his question by showing that there would be production of the metals and minerals covered by this bill, providing there was a sufficient demand and the price paid by the Government or those requiring the same were sufficiently high to induce private capital to enter the field of production. But, further, by way of reply, let me call attention to one or two of the metals referred to in the bill. But first permit me to say that Senators who are not members of the committee have not had the advantage of the extensive investigations made by the committee and the testimony of the numerous witnesses who appeared before the committee and gave the result of their experiences and investigation. Senators not of the committee are compelled to give their impressions based upon their own experiences or their judgment resulting from such information as they may possess. The testimony taken is found in a large volume consisting of several hundred pages. I only saw a copy of the testimony for a few minutes this morning. I hastily read the first 80 pages, and found frequent references therein to manganese, tungsten, and graphite. Mr. McBeth, who appeared before the committee, stated that there are numerous tungsten deposits in the United States, and that private enterprise will produce a sufficient supply to meet all of the demands of the Government and of the trade. I insist, and that I think is a fair deduction from this testimony, that all that the Government needs to do in order to obtain the required amount of tungsten is to pay an adequate price therefor.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. JONES of New Mexico addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield first to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose the Government offer an adequate price; suppose they offer to pay a great big price for tungsten; and suppose a man has an undeveloped tungsten property. He understands perfectly well that he could get that price only while the war lasted, and the war may come to an end to-morrow; the war may come to an end next week, or it may come to an end in six months from now. Will he be justified in spending a couple of hundred thousand dollars to develop his property, to put a plant upon it, when he knows that the ore is of such low grade as that under all ordinary conditions he will not be able to market his product at a profit?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my opinion there is no mineral or metal mentioned in this bill which can not be found in the United States in sufficient quantity for the Government's need but what the Government can obtain it within a reasonable time, provided that it is willing to pay a fair and reasonable price. Of course, what would be a reasonable price in peace times, or if the metals were being mined and produced, would not be a reasonable price in war times, or if the mineral or metal were not being mined and suitable machinery for reducing ore when taken from the ground were not in existence. Any person owning property containing one of the rare metals mentioned in this bill will, of course, demand a sufficient price for the product to justify him incurring the risk and hazard incident to the developing and opening up a property and erecting the necessary machinery to reduce and smelt the ore. But the American business man has always been willing to take a hazard. We are constantly meeting with parallel situations. Many articles are being produced as a result of the war which prior to the war we imported. The high prices which the articles command in the market led the keen American business man into the unknown fields. He took his chances, but realized that the prices which he could command for the product when finished would amply reward him, and he therefore cheerfully subjected himself to the risk and danger that defeat would have produced.

Take the question of radium. The domestic production is sufficient for the Government. It is not only procuring what is needed by our Government, but it has arranged that Great Britain and others of our allies shall get a portion if not all that they need.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it seems to me the reference made by the Senator is rather unfortunate for his argument. Radium in peace times has extensive uses, and in peace times it commands an extraordinary high price because of its use in the arts and in medicine. I have not any late information about the current price of radium, but I do not think the price to-day is in excess of what it was in peace times; so that there is a constant demand there, and yet I dare say there are many deposits of carnotite ore that are of such low grade that it would be unprofitable to work them in peace times.

Take manganese, for instance. By reason of the higher prices of manganese prevailing our production is increasing very gratifyingly, but we are still away below the needs of this Government.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. In that connection I should like to state—and it will also answer the question propounded by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]—that the production of manganese in the United States in 1917 was approximately 115,000 tons, and we imported 655,885 tons; so that there was used in the United States in 1917 770,885 tons of manganese. The estimated production in the United States in 1918 is something above 200,000 tons. Now, the demand has increased; the uses are greater than they were before the war, and greater than they were in 1917; so that we will still be short in the production in the United States over 570,000 tons of manganese. If we can, through this bill, encourage the production in this country, which I understand in Montana is being worked out very satisfactorily now, we can put the United States on a self-sustaining basis in a few years, perhaps, in regard to that very metal.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana stated that I was unfortunate in mentioning radium. I mentioned radium because that is one of the so-called necessaries which is placed in this bill; and, doubtless, the purpose of the bill is to subject radium to the same control as every other article mentioned in the bill. Therefore, I was justified in adverting to radium. I say again that there is no necessity of including radium in the bill. This bill will not improve the market conditions with respect to radium, and will not increase the production. Whatever the market demands are, if the radium is in the country it will be produced. Men have been engaged in the production of radium for a number of years, and have produced large quantities of radium, sufficient for the ordinary uses of our country, and they have radium now for exportation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the carnotite fields that exist in the western part of Colorado and the eastern part of Utah are now practically not being mined at all. As I understand, there is no production going on. The last sales that I heard anything about were at $80,000 a gram.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the Government ought to go into the business of working the fields when there is no demand for the product?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; that is not the object, unless there is a demand.

Mr. KING. If there were a demand, will not the Senator admit that the fields, if they have the ore, would be yielding it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It would depend entirely on whether or not it promised to be a durable demand. That would be a necessary feature, because there are a great many of these mines, and they are not worked at all at the present time, as I understand. There is not any production whatever. There has been some radium produced for a period of three or four years, but I doubt whether in all the world there is as much as 40 grams. That is a limited quantity. Of course it goes far; it is high priced; but it is not produced at the present time, as I understand. I think, as a matter of fact, that instead of the passage of this bill being a detriment to these mines, instead of its being a detriment to the production, if the demand exists, if the Government desires it, if it is essential to the Government, it would have a tendency to stimulate the industry instead of to depress it.

Mr. KING. I do not believe in the Government performing the part of an eleemosynary institution and resuscitating a business that the needs of the public do not warrant. If there is no necessity for the business, then the Government ought not to take the money of the taxpayers and make contributions to the individual who may be engaged in a losing business.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Speaking for the committee, I want to assure the Senator from Utah that no such idea actuated them or moved them to report this bill in these terms. The aid that this bill will give to miners is a mere incident, of no persuasive force with any member of the committee that I know anything about. We were constrained to report this bill because these things are necessary for the conduct of the war. It was in order that the industries of the country may be supplied, and that the war may go forward, the stimulation to the industries, so far as the miners are concerned, being but incidental.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, I did not need the assurance of my distinguished friend from Montana to convince me of that fact; but the observation to which the Senator has just replied was rather in answer to the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and I did deduce from his remarks the idea that the purpose of this bill, or at least one of the effects of the bill, might be to stimulate this waning industry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that as this bill was introduced in the House, or as it came over to us, I regard it as a great detriment. I do not like to see people in my State or in the western part of the country damaged or injured by reason of any legislation whatever. Consequently, we have attempted to guard it so that those injuries will not take place. That is all there is to it. If the Government does not need these metals, nobody desires to force them on the Government. There is nothing of that kind in any part of this bill. The Government is expecting to have extraordinary demands for certain rare metals, and under the present conditions they can not be produced. That being the case, the Government wants in some way to aid in getting that production; and that was our sole purpose in reporting this bill.

Mr. KING. The difference between the Senator and myself arises from this fact: He asserts here very vehemently that without this bill the Government could not procure the rare metals described in this bill.

In my judgment, as I have stated, the Government could procure within a reasonable time any or all of the metals, ores, and minerals mentioned in this bill that can be found in the United States; and, in my opinion, it could procure them for a less price than under the plan contemplated by this bill. It is a matter of common knowledge that many of the metals and minerals mentioned in the bill have been produced at various times in the United States, but because of the lack of market their production has fallen off and, perhaps, in some cases practically ceased. In the hearings Prof. Leith, one of the witnesses who testified before the committee, stated that some of the producers of graphite have closed down their property because of the uncertainty of the market. He further stated that there is an ample supply of graphite in the United States, and that "it is just a question of bringing it out." There has been but a limited market for arsenic, and the domestic production therefore has not been great. There is no necessity for the Government to engage in the production of arsenic. All that is required is to pay a suitable price and the Government will obtain all and more than it requires. The sodium deposits in the United States are ample and a suitable price will produce all that is required. The same can be said of phosphorus, potassium, sulphur, and others of the metals and minerals mentioned in this bill. It is improper to say that some of these metals and minerals are rare.

The reverse is true. They exist in great abundance in the United States, but since the market has been restricted the production has been likewise limited. Moreover, those engaged in the mining industry have been more concerned in producing gold, silver, lead, copper, and zinc, and also coal. With an increasing demand for other metals, unquestionably there will be great development and a marked increase in production.

In our dealings with other nations we have imported some of these metals. They were produced cheaply in other nations, and with the activity of the American miner and mineral and metal producer in other fields there was but slight attention paid to the production of some of these imported minerals and metals. But, as stated, conditions have changed, and we can look for great activity in the mining centers of the United States, and particularly with reference to the minerals and metals mentioned in this bill.

We have produced metals in an abundance whenever there was a demand for their production and there has been the greatest activity where there was the least interruption or interference by the Government.

Further replying to the Senator from Montana, permit me to say that I can conceive of a situation where preliminary outlay would be so enormous as to debar ordinary private enterprises from engaging in the production of a given product. However, it can not be said, in my opinion, that any of the minerals or metals covered by this bill would come within such a class. Indeed, Senators who are championing this bill have stated that there was no intention to have the Government go into the mining business or operate smelters or reduction plants.

The statements of Senators are to the effect that this bill is to enable the Government to enter into contracts running over a considerable period for the purchase of some or all of the minerals and metals mentioned in the bill. It is claimed that with contracts of that nature private individuals will be willing to engage in their production. This position is in effect the attitude which I have taken. I have insisted that the American miner and the American business man with a sufficient inducement will undertake the production of these minerals and metals. The inducement is the payment of a price sufficiently high to warrant the investment and the risk and hazard involved.

Some of the Senators speak as if it were a national calamity to import any article into the United States. This is the old-fashioned Republican view. It is the basis of Republican tariff legislation; and acting upon that view the apostles of high tariff have sought to erect a wall so high as to prevent importation. It was urged that by compulsion there should be domestic production of everything consumed. This extreme doctrine does not meet my approval. We will always have a tariff, a tariff for revenue, a tariff so adjusted as to not discriminate against any section or class. The junior Senator from Alabama has announced a tariff view which has commended itself to many people of our land.

I do not regard trade with other nations as an evil. Whenever we export, of necessity we must import; and the more we export the richer our Nation will become. The trading nation is the prosperous and the progressive nation. I like to see exportations. I should like to see our country export not only manufactured goods and agricultural products but minerals.

And exportations mean reciprocity, the importation of the products of other lands.

The Senator said that we imported a considerable quantity of manganese. Doubtless we paid for the manganese with farm or manufactured products which Spain required; but it is not my purpose to engage in a discussion of the tariff or the question of exports or imports. Now that there is a demand for manganese, and importation is restricted because of the lack of ships, there is at once an increase in the domestic production, and everywhere in the mining districts of the United States there is a great increase in the output of manganese. It is the same with graphite and practically every other mineral or metal that is mentioned in this bill. My opinion is that without legislation of this character, with the Government paying what is a fair price under all the circumstances for the metal, the Government would get whatever metals might be required.

As I stated, however, I shall not oppose this bill. The committee have given it great consideration. They affirm very solemnly that it is needed. It is stated by those who have the conduct of the war that it will greatly increase the production of metals required in the war. I have no doubt but that under this bill mining can be stimulated, and the output of metals increased. But the price will be, I am afraid, too great and the policy established too dangerous. It will give to men, to bureaus, to those who view everything from the bureaucratic standpoint opportunity for the extension of bureaucracy. It will give to those who want to embark our Government in extreme socialistic schemes and enterprises increased fuel for the fires which may be lighted. It will encourage those measures of like or similar character extending the powers of the Federal Government into the private concerns and into the field of private endeavor. If we are not careful, nothing will be immune from the omnipotent touch of the Federal Government. We will next seek to take over the smelters, the copper, lead, and coal mines; and later, perhaps, the manufacturing plants and the mills, and all of those great enterprises that have tended to enrich our country, and that are the product of the initiative, the splendid genius, the prudence, and sagacity of the American people. We should be careful lest the day come when we will have nothing to tax and all the fountains of wealth shall have been dried.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to interrupt. I thought possibly the Senator was in his peroration.

Mr. KING. I do not "perorate." I leave that to other distinguished Senators.

Mr. KENYON. I make very few perorations myself, I know; but I should like to ask the Senator, as he has studied the bill, a question in regard to section 5, which appropriates $500,000 "for the payment of all administrative expenses under this act, including personal services," and so forth, "both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere." Has the Senator any estimate as to how many employees are to be used in carrying out the administrative features of this act?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have thought of that. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] a few days ago, when this bill was under consideration, invited the attention of the chairman of the committee to this large amount and stated that it was in excess of the appropriation annually made for the entire Bureau of Mines.

Mr. KENYON. Further, I suggest to the Senator that these employees are to be both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere. We are doing everything we can to get employees out of the District of Columbia. I should like to know from somebody the number of employees there will be under this act, and the number of those who are to be in the District of Columbia. I can not understand why we should spend $500,000 to administer this act.

Mr. KING. I do not think that anybody—not even the distinguished chairman of the committee or the members of the committee—can give any evidence as to the number of employees that will be required under the operations of this bill.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose, now, that the matter of $500,000 or the number of employees is rather an immaterial matter.

Mr. KING. We do not know the agency that will be selected or created, if it is not already in existence, for the purpose of enforcing this law. It may be some bureau that is already in existence. It may be that an entirely different agency will be created. My opinion is that the latter policy will be pursued. Of course, with a new agency the number of employees is purely conjectural, and the Senator can guess upon that matter far better than I can. I have no doubt that the appropriation will be exhausted, and perhaps we will have a deficiency appropriation. If the Government attempts to operate mines or smelters, then this appropriation will be entirely too small. If an existing bureau administers the bill, the appropriation carried by the bill for administration purposes will, I believe, be sufficient.

Mr. President, this bill seems to commend itself to the judgment of the Senate. It seems to provoke not even a ripple of discord. I appear to be the only "fly in the ointment."

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question? Does the Senator think his statement is accurate about the judgment of the Senate? Does he believe that over a dozen Senators take any interest in the bill or know anything about it?

Mr. KING. I would not want to sit in judgment upon my colleagues. I shall give them the presumption of innocence and assert that they have bestowed upon the bill the most unusual attention and the profoundest thought and that they are so satisfied with it that they have absented themselves from the Chamber.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in reference to the inquiry made by the Senator from Iowa, I may say, being a member of the committee, that I hardly think a great part of the appropriation of $500,000 will be expended here in Washington for clerical assistance or help; but the bill contemplates that the Government may take over partially developed or partially worked or even neglected mines. It is expected, as there is no other fund than that provided in the bill, that much of the $500,000 will be expended in that way, in field and survey work and in estimates made of the productivity of the different mines contemplated in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator what is contemplated as to the number of additional employees or agents to be used under the bill in the District of Columbia? Was there any information given to the committee on that point?

Mr. STERLING. I hardly think any definite statement was made before the committee as to the number of employees who might be required in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he will accept an amendment to the bill to the effect that the salaries and compensations paid under the bill shall be no greater than the salaries and compensation paid for like or similar services in other departments of the Government?

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I see no objection to that whatever, but it was not the intention of those who would administer the bill—because I have talked with them—to go to any unnecessary expense in this matter. I might state, for the benefit of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Iowa, that the plan under which the bill will be administered is not fully worked out, but there was a plan proposed whereby they would zone the United States and have a competent mining man in each zone. They thought that under a system of that kind they probably would not have more than a hundred employees, or something of that kind. They will have to send men out to examine property, and assays will have to be made, and things of that kind will have to be carried on. They may also have to send an agent to some foreign country to get contracts with people there for various of these metals. It is hard to tell just what their expenses will be; but what is the use of having a bill unless you can operate under it successfully and have the money to carry on the operations? They may not expend half that amount; I hope they will not; but if it is necessary, they should have it, so that they can go right ahead.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senator in charge of the bill the reason why I suggested that amendment. The attention of Senators has repeatedly been called to the fact that many of the departments, and particularly some of the new agencies and instrumentalities being created, are bidding against each other for employees. Yesterday one of the chief executive officers of one of the most important departments of the Government complained to me about the situation and stated that men who had been in the department for years had been taken away by some of the new governmental agencies. The employees so taken away were promised much larger salaries. It developed yesterday in the Committee on the Census that men had been taken from the Census Bureau by the Emergency Fleet Corporation and by other newly created agencies, the higher compensation being the lodestone attracting them. In one case mentioned the employee in the Census Bureau received $2,500 but is now getting $5,000 from the fleet corporation. If the agencies and instrumentalities that we are constantly creating are permitted to invade the fields occupied by the departments and take away from them their employees without restriction the work of the departments will be demoralized and serious harm will come to the Government.

Therefore, I have felt that in all agencies hereafter created there ought to be some provision that will prevent a repetition and continuation of this evil, so harmful in its consequences.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I think if we go into this business the people of the United States will understand a good deal more about the mining business when they get through with it than they understand now. They will know that the development of the great mineral wealth of this country is the most important business that could occupy the attention of the people of the country at this time. Of all the wealth accumulated in the United States to-day there is more added wealth due to the development of the natural resources of rock, the mines, than from all other sources combined.

Mining is a business requiring experts, Mr. President. I know that is contrary to the general supposition which is that a waiter at a hotel gets a tip from a copper king of Kamskatka or somewhere else and makes a fortune in a mine. That is the general idea, I think, that is held by a great many of the people of the United States about mining.

I can say that the fears of the Senator from Utah are groundless, if this bill is properly administered, as to the expenditure of this $500,000 interfering with any other bureau I know of in the United States Government to-day. It will not interfere in the very slightest degree, because there is scarcely a man in the Government employ in any department, unless it be Barney Baruch himself and Replogle, his assistant, who knows anything about the mining business of to-day. If you were to pay Mr. Replogle, in charge of this bureau, what his services are worth, instead of the dollar a year which he is now serving his country for, $100,000 of it at the very least estimate of the $500,000 would go for his service alone. You have been enabled to secure, through the patriotism of men of this kind, the services of men whom, if you undertook to employ them simply to operate the $50,000,000 appropriation that is contemplated here, you could not secure for twice $500,000. You must send a man to examine an ore body who knows something about the cubic contents of ore. For instance, if you want to estimate as to how much ore there is in a given body before you can handle it at all you must know what the general analysis of that ore is, because, although it may be 50 per cent manganese, it may have a combination of such other alloys or minerals that it will be necessary to treat it in a certain way, making it cost twice as much as another deposit 500 yards away or a mile away? You must have an expert who knows how to do this business. You have not a man employed in the United States to-day, except in the high positions to which I have referred, who has any knowledge whatever upon this subject.

Bear in mind that no geologist in the employ of the United States Government or any private corporation, so far as I am aware, ever discovered or developed a lode or body of minerals. We have geologists, but they are not practical miners or mining men, and by the time one of them completed a geological survey where some brogan-shoed miner had discovered a deposit, and told you how the particular mineral happened to be deposited, by the time he had arrived at his conclusion and put it down upon paper, to tell how that mineral was deposited, the war would have been over.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator might add that some of the most valuable mineral products of the land were discovered by the prospectors in the identical regions where the scientists said no minerals existed.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; they said that gold could not exist there. Half a dozen geological reports were made that in the Cripple Creek district gold could not exist, and at White Oaks, N. Mex., because of the filling of the veins with gypsum, and that gold could not exist in gypsum. Yet the geologists later found that there were nuggets weighing as much as a pound or 2 pounds in the gypsum itself.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, will not the geologists and the scientists be the very people who will be employed under this bill?

Mr. FALL. Not if Barney Baruch or Replogle run the business. I say that unhesitatingly, because they are business men. One of them for years has been buying and selling minerals and the other one's business has been that of producing iron and steel economically, and he knows more about that business than any other man in the United States, I presume.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, the Government will reverse what has been its policy for the last 40 years.

Mr. FALL. I do say—and I say very frankly to the Senator—if I did not believe the men now in charge of the metals purchasing division of the United States Government would entirely reverse the policy of the Government I would never vote to create such a bureau, nor one cent of money to form such a corporation as is contemplated here.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that Mr. Barney M. Baruch will have anything to do with the administration of this bill?

Mr. FALL. I think it would clearly come within his province, and I voted for the Overman bill with the idea that the President of the United States might allocate Mr. Baruch to do exactly such work as this.

Mr. KING. I think he is one of the ablest executives who can be found in this country, and if he were selected for the administration of the agency created by the bill it would be a most fortunate thing for the Government?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McCUMBER. What assurance has the Senator that he would be selected?

Mr. FALL. I can not give any assurance. I am simply speaking as a practical mining man in answer to the suggestions made that $500,000 is too much. I say that you must have expert men in every branch of this service if you are going to make a success of it. For instance, I happen to know that the Government of the United States, operating, I think, under direct orders from Mr. Baruch in its attempt to secure manganese, for example, has been compelled to say to the purchasers of manganese from the mines in the southwestern country, "take our analysis, take our percentage, and settle with this man," because the particular purchaser at this time objected to or refused to accept the assays made by the producer and his experts, and insisted upon basing the payment for the carloads of manganese shipped to them upon their own assays, and the difference was about two-thirds of the total value per car. The Government had to step in and secure the production of manganese and say to the purchaser, "Take our assays and settle upon our assays"; and an expert Government agent was necessary, as an expert Government agent will be necessary in every line of this business. This is peculiarly a high-place expert business.

Then there is nothing but the principle involved. Does the Senate of the United States care to see the Government go into this business? If you do, your corporation will be, if properly handled, such a corporation as we knew in the old days of Ladenburg, Thalman & Co., with their agents all over the world engaged in handling, buying, and selling and the disposition of minerals, a corporation such as we know now has been created and operated by the different metal selling agencies which handle the product of the great copper mines of the West. Of course, the ordinary impression is that the producers of the ore handle the product of the ore. That is an entirely erroneous impression. It is handled by the smelter selling company. Through their methods of handling and selling they have been enabled to keep the different mines running. One pound of copper might cost in one mine 7 cents to produce and in another mine 13 cents to produce, and the price would be only 13½ or 15 cents. It has been possible to do that through the metals purchasing and selling companies, and that is the purpose of this bill.

I can say to you very frankly, Senators, that you will not find, in my judgment, if you intend to go into the business at all, that $500,000 is too much. It is evidently the purpose to establish a new bureau here, because it is provided in a paragraph of this appropriation itself that none of this money shall be used for paying present employees any addition to their present salaries.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in answer to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. He is assuming that the Government is going to take over the mines and operate them and operate the smelters and everything that is necessary to get these minerals to market. The object of the committee was not to frame such a bill, and it is not expected that that will ever occur. There are certain powers that are given which if necessary would produce something of that result, but so far as the operation of the bill is concerned it is expected that the Government will stimulate as far as it can the individual efforts of the miners for the purpose of getting out these ores. The information came to us, as members of the committee, that these minerals are indispensable to our success in the prosecution of the war, and that these are minerals that must be had.

As the Senator knows, the bill as it was first introduced in the House made entirely different provisions. It provided that there should be maximum prices fixed for these minerals, and then after amendments were made it provided for minimum prices only. Our experience has not been good in fixing maximum prices. Even the fixing of a minimum price, if it happened to be too high, might result in there being produced from the mines of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars worth of these ores which the Government might not need at that time. You have to contract for a period of time over which these minerals shall be produced or else the miners will not undertake their production, no matter what the price may be.

I believe in the principle of supply and demand. In normal times you can count upon practically the same demand existing. I have always believed in the principle of supply and demand as controlling transactions in commerce; but when a condition arises which necessitates the production of a certain quantity of ore within a certain time, and you know that you can not get the ore within that time unless you stimulate its production, it becomes a different proposition. In order to induce a miner to produce ores he has to have an assurance that the price that is to be paid to him shall remain fixed and permanent for at least such a period of time as will permit him to reimburse himself for the outlay which he must make in order to develop the property. A man is not going to spend $100,000 in developing a mine and take the chance of the bottom falling out of the market price of his product within a year. He has to have a certain amount of profit to justify him within a period of time to produce the metal.

It is a great deal better that we should have a contract system, which is the system provided by the bill, than to give a blanket guaranty that all the material that shall be produced shall be sold to the Government at a guaranteed price. The result of that system would be that there might be upon the part of the Government a liability of hundreds of millions of dollars. We have wiped out those provisions. We have gone to the contract system as well as it can be defined and as well as it can be made applicable and workable.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the bill is so eminently fair that we ought to pass it.

There is pending an amendment which I proposed and upon which I would like to have a vote.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, just a word upon this bill. In ordinary times there is no feature of this measure that would commend itself to the approval of my judgment. I think that as regards a number of the so-called necessaries recited in the bill there ought to be in the ordinary course of production even in war times an abundant supply for the uses of industry and of commerce and for military purposes. But as to that my information is not specific.

The dependence of the United States upon other countries for a large number of the materials which are recited in the bill has been due to the fact that in this country their deposit is comparatively sparse and also to the fact that production in foreign countries and importations into America of these materials has been economically profitable. Much of this material comes from neutral countries, and if we had an abundance of tonnage the difficulty now confronting the Government would not exist. There is no trouble about the supply. The difficulty is in the means of transportation. Hence we are obliged to look to ourselves for the production of these minerals as far as possible, and while some of them have been produced in a profitable quantity in the United States a very considerable number of them have not. The average individual, however enterprising, is unable at present to secure capital for any new enterprise. Here and there there may be an exception, but speaking broadly and generally the Capital Issues Committee will not sanction the issuance of securities to companies designed to promote and develop minerals of the several sorts mentioned in the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there will the Senator inform us why such persons can not get the credit under our general corporation law, where we appropriated $500,000,000 for the very purpose of assisting these needed industries?

Mr. THOMAS. I can give the Senator the reason assigned in an individual case. My colleague and I had occasion to go with a couple of our constituents from Boulder County to the Capital Issues Committee within the past two weeks. The gentlemen are engaged in the production of tungsten, one of the materials mentioned in this bill. They have been engaged in tungsten mining and ore treatment for some time, and are producing a fairly large quantity of the metal, but owing to the price of labor and of materials needed for the reduction of the ores they must increase the quantity of their product if they are to make any profit under prevailing prices. Hence they enlarged the capitalization of their company and came to Washington and asked permission to float their securities to the extent necessary to enable them to double their capacity and at the same time open a sufficient number of mines known to contain tungsten. The proposition was turned down upon the ground that the industry contemplated in the enterprise was of a speculative character. Of course, all mining is speculative, some of it extremely hazardous, but I think that the construction given the enterprise was erroneous, because it affected a growing concern whose purpose was to increase its capacity and supply the Government with a much-needed alloy. The statement was made—not in my presence; I speak on second-hand information—that the rule applicable to this instance is made general and applicable to all instances of a similar character, and is one of the reasons for the appearance of this bill.

In that particular instance I am very sure that if those gentlemen can obtain the needed aid from the Government or from some other source they can very largely increase the percentage of our local tungsten supply. Whether they can get it from this bill is, I presume, a matter of administration, on which I do not propose to enter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me again? Of course I do not know to what extent tungsten is a war necessity.

Mr. THOMAS. It is absolutely necessary as an alloy for the best qualities of steel.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I do know that we created this corporation for the very purpose of rendering whatever assistance was necessary to any company or institution that was producing war necessaries. If that corporation is not performing its intended functions, we ought to know it. I can not see why it is necessary to introduce another bill to create some other force to do that which we authorized and directed them to do.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not sufficiently familiar with the modus operandi of the Capital Issues Committee to sit in judgment upon it. I only speak from the knowledge which I possess, and that is embodied in the illustration that I have just given. I quite agree with the Senator that in instances of this kind, where no money is asked from the Government, but merely the privilege to raise it outside, every doubt should be construed in favor of the individual, provided his record and reputation warrant it, so as to enable him to proceed in the ordinary way that business follows in time of peace.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. In further answer I wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota that the War Finance Corporation under the act is restricted to certain classes of loans; or, in other words, under section 7 of the act——

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, but if the Senator will permit me, this application was not for a loan at all. All they wanted was permission to float their securities and take their chances in the financial markets of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. That comes before the Priorities Board.

Mr. THOMAS. It came before both. The Priorities Board sent this question to the Capital Issues Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that they refused?

Mr. THOMAS. I so stated. It was refused.

Mr. SMOOT. And it was for the production of tungsten?

Mr. THOMAS. For the enlargement of the plant, an enterprise that had been in existence and had produced it for some time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say right now in this connection, I think we can take $25,000,000 and encourage the miners to produce an increased amount of tungsten and some of the other minerals mentioned by direct means rather than through an organization such as proposed under this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Speaking of that particular mineral I have no doubt of it. If the price of tungsten could be increased 10 or 15 per cent above what it now commands, I think it would have that effect, undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. All that the Colorado producers of tungsten have asked is $1.35 a unit.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator means an increase of that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not an increase, but $1.35 a unit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it sells now for $23 a unit.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah must be mistaken in his figures.

Mr. SMOOT. The War Industries Board has placed a price upon it of $1.25 a unit, making——

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator will find that a unit of tungsten is not a pound; it is a great deal more than that. I think it is 20 pounds; that is my impression. That would make the price very nearly as the Senator has stated. At $23 a unit of 20 pounds the price would be, as the Senator can see, around $1.15 a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. One dollar and twenty-five cents a unit is what the price is fixed at to-day. The Colorado producers of tungsten ask for $1.35.

Mr. THOMAS. With 20 pounds to the unit and $1.35 a pound, the price per unit would be above $25.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be about $25 a unit.

It seems to me that an increase of 10 cents a unit ought to have been granted, because that is what the producers ask for and what they said would be required to insure an additional amount of tungsten from the mines of Colorado; and I know that it would have done so in the State of Utah. How much easier it would have been to have even paid $1.75 a unit for the 8,000 tons of tungsten which are needed in this country over and above what there is in sight. If the Government had paid that price there would have been no need of any such organization as that provided for in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. It would have had that result so far as concerns that mineral.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask my colleague by what authority that price was fixed by the board or organization to which the Senator has just referred?

Mr. SMOOT. All I desire to say is that Mr. Baruch frankly admitted, as I understand, that there was no direct authority, but it was so vitally necessary that there were $3,000,000 set aside for the purpose of buying tungsten, and the price was fixed at $1.25 a unit.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate any longer than to observe that this bill has received unusual consideration from the committee having it in charge. I know personally that the committee have been laboring with it, have investigated this subject, and have conferred with all and everyone who could give them any information whatever on the subject. I think I can say without hesitation they have done as much work and as good a work upon this bill as has been done upon any bill that has emanated from a committee since I have been a Member of the Senate. Hence I hesitate to criticize its inclusion in the various materials of minerals and mineralized subjects which I know exist in great abundance in different parts of the United States.

Let me close as I began by saying that the only justification for this bill, in my opinion, is the present necessitous condition generated by the existence of war. I do not think that it is necessary to take care of producing materials of this sort after the war shall have been concluded; I think that is largely imaginary, because when peace returns to a war-stricken world and when industries once more make the effort to stand erect the demand for labor and material of all sorts will, in my judgment, exceed, if that be possible, the existing demand for them during times of war. The period between the end of the war and the ultimate reestablishment of economic conditions will be the period in which all materials of commerce and labor will enjoy a prosperity not vouchsafed to them during these times of extraordinary and feverish demand.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood the Senator from Utah to say in regard to tungsten that a unit was a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty pounds.

Mr. HENDERSON. As I understand, a unit is 20 pounds of tungsten trioxide.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I think the difference between the Senator from Utah and myself arose from the fact that I confounded a unit with a pound, and possibly the Senator from Utah also did. He spoke of a valuation that covered a pound when I supposed he meant a unit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is there an amendment pending?

Mr. KING. I was about to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has an amendment pending.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I should prefer first to have that amendment acted upon before I take the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment, on page 21, line 7, beginning with the word "and," to strike out the following: "and of such other rare or unusual elements."

Mr. President, that amendment to the amendment is offered because in section 1 of the bill are enumerated all the rare metals the United States needs in the prosecution of the war. A number of the minerals mentioned are not rare in any sense of the word, and I expect to offer further amendments to take out the very common minerals. I believe that if we are going to act favorably upon this bill, we ought to specifically state the metals that are to be covered, and not have a basket clause which could be construed to cover all of the metals which may be produced in the United States. I do not think there will be an objection to this. I think that every rare metal is mentioned that ought to be.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I will state that I have no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah. As I said the other day, it was not the intention of the committee so to draw the bill as to include anything else except the metals mentioned here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to suggest that if we are going to enumerate the minerals which we desire covered, it ought to be done with considerable care——

Mr. KING. They are enumerated.

Mr. FLETCHER. For there are a number of these minerals with very peculiar names; they are very technical, and they are being developed all the while.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that even paper clay is classed as a rare mineral, and I am quite sure that there is nothing in the way of rare minerals that can be found in the dictionary that is not included.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would not venture to pass upon the matter myself, but if the experts have passed upon it I am quite satisfied.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment, as a new section, on page 26, line 11, after the word "law," to insert:

That no person employed under the provisions of this act shall be paid any salary or compensation in excess of that paid for similar or like services rendered in executive departments of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I move to strike from the bill all after the word "act," on line 23, page 23, down to the words "The fund," on line 3, page 24.

Mr. SMOOT. That is to conform to the amendment which was offered by the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on line 1, page 21, I move to strike out the word "chalk." I do not think that can possibly be called a rare mineral, for it is found in many of the States of the Union. I have not heard any reason why it could not be produced in such quantities as may be required by the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HENDERSON. The degree of independence of chalk as shown to the committee is as follows: That in 1917 the production in this country of chalk was 8 per cent out of a consumption of 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is absolutely true; and the reason of it is because chalk can be produced in foreign countries a great deal more cheaply than it can be produced here. Chalk is not a rare mineral. What we have got to do as to chalk is to pay a price for it which will enable miners to produce it in this country. I do not believe that we ought to put the Government of the United States into producing the common minerals that can be found almost anywhere and which, under the operation of the bill, will cost the Government more than if a fair price was put upon them, so that they can be produced by the individual owners of such properties.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood that there was no true chalk obtained in the United States; that we got it mostly from England. Therefore we included it in the bill. Now, as I understand, none of the various rare metals or minerals of which we have a sufficient supply or are getting a sufficient supply will be affected by this bill. It is only those that we actually need in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator should have said "refined" chalk rather than "pure" chalk.

Mr. HENDERSON. I said "true" chalk.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, "true" chalk. There is plenty of true chalk, Mr. President. I think the bill ought to be confined to the rare minerals that are required in the production of munitions of war, steel, and other commodities required for war purposes. I think the Senator from Nevada ought to accept the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know nothing about these minerals, and I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Utah. The Senator has just suggested that we can get chalk, and perhaps get it easily, if we will pay a price which will justify its production. The Senator from Colorado or the Senator from Utah—I do not remember which—said that we could get tungsten mined in sufficient quantities if we would pay a sufficient price. It will cost the Government just as much as it will private individuals, and probably 50 per cent more, at least, to accomplish the same result. Is there any one of these metals that we can not obtain just as well if we will pay a price that will justify their mining; and why should not the Government, instead of appropriating the vast sums carried by this bill, say to the miner, "We will pay you such a price and contract with you for such a price as will enable you, even with the present high cost of labor, to produce the article and sell it to the Government"?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. HENDERSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I asked the question, of course, of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. There are metals enumerated in this bill that can not be produced in that way. Certain of the metals named—I am not going to take the time to specifically enumerate them—are rare metals which the Government wants quickly, and therefore it desires the power to produce them at the very earliest date possible. This can be done by the Government quicker than by the individual owners. They are to-day found in small quantities; and I doubt whether any individual would undertake, or could secure assistance to undertake, to produce certain of these metals at any reasonable price and get them out in time to meet the Government's requirements.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, the Senator from Utah thinks that the Senator from Colorado is in error in his assumption that the Government itself will not go into the mining business?

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure the Government will; I have no doubt of it as to certain of the metals named.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not any doubt, if I may say so, that the Government will go into all of these lines, and probably go into them to as great an extent as it has gone into the telegraphic field; and the first result will be that it will enormously increase the wages of all employes, and then it will produce, if it produces at all, at a cost three or four times in excess of the price it is paying to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the Senator to understand that I am not enamored of this kind of legislation. If the conditions were other than they are to-day, I do not believe that this bill would receive 10 votes in this body. Before we get through I wish to move to take out of the bill the common minerals, so that it may be understood in the future, if the bill becomes a law and is ever referred to as a precedent, that it only covers rare metals. If we put in the bill chalk, fuller's earth, fluorspar, mica, and sulphur it will appear as if we did want the Government to go into the mining business and into the production of metals not for any special purpose, but for the mere purpose of engaging in the business. Take sulphur, for instance——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I wish to say, Mr. President, that in the State of Utah we have mountains of sulphur. The sulphur in my State is not in veins, as rare metals are generally found.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. In a moment. It is a question of transportation. What we ought to do in order to get sulphur in certain remote places is to provide transportation at low rates for it. Then it could be handled beyond a doubt. In the State of Wyoming there are great fields of sulphur which are being worked to-day; and, of course, we all know that in Louisiana great quantities of sulphur are produced. I might say the same thing is true of Nevada and also of almost every Western State. I think there is more real necessity for including sulphur in the bill, perhaps, than any of the other common minerals I have named; and yet we can produce all the sulphur that is necessary, if we will furnish the shipping facilities and pay a price that will justify the producer in paying the freight, for it is not so much a queston of getting the sulphur as it is a question of transportation.

Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator said a moment ago that there were a few items which he thought were of a peculiar or scarce character that could not be obtained quickly enough for the necessities of the Government unless the Government took hold of their production. Will the Senator point out some of those items?

Mr. SMOOT. I will name bismuth, bromine, chromium, cobalt, corundum. Then there are molybdenum, mercury, potassium, pyrites, and tungsten. Those are the rare minerals that the Government must have. We have got to have them if they are to be had in the world. If the shipping facilities were such that we could send all over the world for these minerals, then there would be no necessity for this bill. In that event, I should say let the ships go to the countries in which these minerals are produced and bring them to this country, as has been done in the past; but the shipping facilities are such that the ships can not be spared. Therefore, Mr. President, we must produce these minerals in this country, and the manner provided in this bill is about the only way that we shall be able to secure them.

Take, for instance, kaolin. Kaolin is not in any sense a rare metal. Kaolin is found in great beds in many of the States, particularly in the West. Of course, we all know a little about mica, which is produced in New Hampshire and in North Carolina. I have heard of no special demand which has been made for mica. I can not see why we are not able to produce in this country all the mica that is necessary for war purposes. The known deposits now are owned by companies which are producing mica, and if the price were sufficient they could increase their production to supply all that is needed for the requirements of the United States, because the substance is found in large quantities in the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to state, as showing the degree of independence of mica in the United States, that out of 100 per cent consumption the domestic production is only 38 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is about right.

Mr. HENDERSON. The object of the bill is to encourage production and to bring it up to the full requirements and needs of the Government. So far as mica is concerned, we do not use a great deal; I presume about 6,000 tons a year is used.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the very maximum. Mr. President, how often have we heard it stated upon the floor of the Senate that if we wanted to produce a certain commodity required by the people or the Government all we had to do was to put a tariff upon it? I recognize the fact that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] had slight leanings toward an adequate tariff upon mica, as it is produced in North Carolina; but I say now that, with a fair tariff upon mica, every ounce that might be required at any time in this country could be produced in the single State of North Carolina.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I think the Senator is correct; and it is due largely to the fact that there has been no stabilization of prices with reference to mica and some of the other substances to which he has referred by a proper protection of American industry that we now find ourselves in the position where we have not these articles and must go to some extraordinary end to achieve the same result which if the policy of the Senator and mine had been followed we would have achieved long ago in times of peace. However, those are questions of opinion. Now, we are confronted with a war condition; and I am supporting the bill—and I think the Senator and I are together upon that at least—upon the theory that this measure will allow a stabilization of prices. For instance, the price of tungsten has been going up and down at such a rate that almost every man who is engaged in the production of tungsten or attempting to uncover bodies of tungsten has gone broke because one day he would be told that he could get so much money for it, but after he had expended thousands of dollars in uncovering a body of ore and was ready to produce, then he found that the market for the commodity had gone into the hands of one or two parties, and he lost his money. This bill will enable the Government to offer him a stabilized price for the continuance at least of the term of the contract into which he enters.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator says, I want to call the attention of the Senate to a mining district in the State of Utah called the Gold Hill district. Tungsten was discovered there in considerable bodies and has been produced in limited quantities, but when it was shipped to the smelter the smelter said, "We do not know what price we can pay you for it; tungsten changes in price so rapidly that we can not afford to buy tungsten unless we buy at a price which we know will involve no loss to us."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, could not the Government, without this bill, make a contract for such a price? What is there to prevent the Government from making such a contract?

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator, although I do not know that it ought to be made public. We are short many thousands of tons of tungsten for the year 1918; even if the full amount of tungsten is produced, as estimated by the Bureau of Mines. We must get tungsten in some way in order to make the steel necessary to build our ships and for other purposes. I wish to say now that, as much as I dislike the bill, as much as, in my opinion, it is absolutely contrary to all principles of legislation that ever I thought would be presented to Congress, I must not vote against it if for no other reason than that it may get the necessary quantity of tungsten.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator if he himself does not believe that if we would pay a price sufficient to justify the miners in seeking out and finding tungsten we would in the end get it very much cheaper than we will after we have appropriated this $50,000,000?

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator from Utah will allow me right there I will state that it is a question of time. The stability of the market is what controls the miner as to whether he is going to put $50,000 in a mine and thereby produce at a price at which he knows he can make some money.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and my opinion is—and it is justified by the arguments that have been made by Senators from the mining States for years—that a good western miner in point of time will find mines very much more quickly than will a Government expert.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SMOOT. If he has the capital.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If he has the capital to develop the mine; but the difficulty is that the price, while high to-day, may be low by the time the miner opens up his mine. Tungsten has varied from $108 a unit of 20 pounds down to $23.

Mr. McCUMBER. That could be overcome by a stabilized price on the part of the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what we are trying to get by this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It can be done without the bill.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. The Government can undoubtedly buy tungsten for governmental purposes, but the Government now has no authority to buy tungsten needed by the independent or other steel makers in the United States and sell and turn it over to them, unless you do give it legislative permission. That is exactly the proposition of this bill—to enable the Government to buy and sell and allocate these minerals, because it is from private individuals that the Government is getting its steel. The Government is not in the business of making steel, but is buying its steel, and tungsten is needed in certain classes of steel. The Government, unless it were itself making steel, would have no use for tungsten after it bought it, and yet it is absolutely necessary in the production of steel.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that; but I think, if the Senator will look over the laws we have passed, he will find that there is ample authority on the part of the Government to purchase any of these articles that may be needed and sell them to producing companies, even though they are private companies.

Mr. FALL. I do not think so.

Mr. SMOOT. The trouble is that there is no appropriation; and, as I just answered my colleague [Mr. KING], they virtually set the law aside and set aside $3,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing tungsten and stabilizing the price.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, all through the discussion of this bill I have refrained from giving facts and figures in connection with some of these rare metals, for the reason that I have regarded them as confidential and not advisable to give out to the world at this time. However, the condition as to tungsten has now been brought out. The production, imports, and requirements of the United States for 12 months, beginning May 1, 1918, in regard to tungsten are as follows:

Estimated requirements, 16,000 tons.
Domestic production, 4,500 tons.
Imports, 7,000 tons.
Additional requirements, 4,500 tons.

We must have that tungsten. In order to keep pace with the United States consumption, domestic production and imports must be increased 365 tons monthly.

That is the situation to-day with regard to tungsten.

The prices were spoken of a little while ago, and, as the Senator from Colorado said, they have varied greatly. In 1914 the ore concentrates, based on 60 per cent of tungsten, were $400 per ton; in 1915, $1,800 per ton; in 1916, $2,100 per ton; in 1917, $1,200 per ton; and in 1918, $1,500 per ton.

That shows just how the market has fluctuated in regard to tungsten.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have a committee meeting that I must attend. I had hoped to be able to offer the amendments referred to. I will say that if there are any other amendments, or anybody else desires to speak upon them, I shall not be gone more than half an hour, and I can offer the other amendments when I return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, just one word there. I realize that there may be a few of the metals mentioned in this bill produced in sufficient quantity at this time, but after a careful consideration of the whole subject matter the committee decided that it was better to have them in the bill, so that in the future if any action was necessary it could be taken without coming back to the Congress for more legislation. It is not the intention of the committee to have any of these metals interfered with in the least as long as the production is sufficient to meet the needs and requirements at this time. Next year, however, a new situation may be presented, whereby some of them that we leave out now might need to be controlled by the Government. That is the only reason why it is thought best to include all of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to that I want to say to the Senator that if at any time the War Industries Board should intimate that they wanted this bill amended by adding a certain rare metal to it, I am sure the amendment could pass Congress within a week. I am looking out for the future. I am looking out for the time, 10 or 15 years ahead, when some proposition may be made in this Chamber or in Congress asking for just such powers as these, covering not only these items, but all of the mining industries in the United States, and having this pointed to as a precedent established by Congress. If I thought my amendment was going to interfere in any way with the object of the bill, I would not insist upon it; but I know you western Senators are just as deeply interested in this question as I can possibly be, and you want to protect the mining industries just as much as I do. I believe, therefore, that it is the wiser thing to take out chalk, fluorspar, fuller's earth, kaolin, and mica.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not insist upon his amendments. Each one of these minerals has been investigated closely and carefully, and the amount of present and possible product determined as near as can be. There has been every endeavor to include only those rare minerals which the Government will likely need. The Senator from Utah may have peculiar knowledge as to a few items, but there are many mentioned there that he probably does not know the facts concerning. On that account, it is safer to rely upon the experts who came before the committee and testified as to the necessity of each one of these rare metals, than it is to rely upon a Senator who rises and says, "I do not think the Government needs this or that mineral."

Mr. President, that is not a safe way to legislate. If this were a bill under which a wrong might be perpetrated on somebody, it would be well to watch each item, and insist upon the improper items going out. If it were a bill which provided that there should be a maximum price fixed, it seems to me we ought to examine each item carefully and resolve the doubts in favor of the miner. Under this bill, however, no harm can be done to him. For that reason it seems to me we ought to approve the bill as given to us by the experts with relation to each one of these items, instead of amending it as suggested by the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment and that the Chair appoint the conferees upon the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. POINDEXTER conferees on the part of the Senate.

MINIMUM WAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12098.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to have the title of the bill stated.

Mr. KENYON. The bill is what is known as the minimum-wage bill for the District of Columbia. It has passed the House and has been reported unanimously from the District of Columbia Committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12098.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. We ought to have an executive session. There are five or six hundred nominations here. They are routine, but they ought to be disposed of.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a bill here also from the Commerce Committee that has no opposition. It has been recommended by the department. It is in pursuance of a convention that has been entered into.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah withdraw his motion?

Mr. KING. I will withhold it for a moment.

Mr. MARTIN. I want to have an executive session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that this bill has passed the House. It has been considered twice by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. That is, the Senate committee reported a Senate bill that is almost identical with this. I think about the only change is that in the Senate bill we provided for compensation to the board of $5 a day for actual services, and expenses. That was left out of the House bill when the Senate committee reported it, and that is substantially the only difference between the two bills.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that there are one or two Senators, I know, who were speaking about some amendments. I have no objection to the bill being made the unfinished business, and I think we can pass it very quickly when we convene again.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that the bill has gotten out of the Committee of the Whole and is now in the Senate.

Mr. KING. I did not understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, as there seems to be some opposition to the bill and there are very few Senators present, I suggest that it be temporarily laid aside, without losing its place as the unfinished business. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has an uncontested matter, which probably can be disposed of in a very few minutes. If that is agreeable to the Senator in charge of the bill, it will facilitate the business of the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will say that I made the motion in the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who is in charge of the bill and who is here now. He and I are deeply interested in the bill. If it is satisfactory to him that it be temporarily laid aside and not lose its place as the unfinished business and not lose its present place on the calendar, I have no objection.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, under the circumstances that will be agreeable, with the understanding that the bill is not to lose its position as the unfinished business, but is merely temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida and the Senator from Iowa ask unanimous consent that the bill may be temporarily laid aside and made the unfinished business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my motion, Mr. President.

PROTECTION OF TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4889.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4889) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Patents shall keep a register of all marks communicated to him by the international bureaus provided for by the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, in connection with which the fee of $50 gold for the international registration established by Article II of that convention has been paid, which register shall show a facsimile of the mark; the name and residence of the registrant; the number, date, and place of the first registration of the mark, including the date on which application for such registration was filed and the term of such registration, a list of goods to which the mark is applied as shown by the registration in the country of origin, and such other data as may be useful concerning the mark.

SEC. 2. That whenever any person shall deem himself injured by the inclusion of a trade-mark on this register, he may at any time apply to the Commissioner of Patents to cancel the registration thereof. The commissioner shall refer such application to the examiner in charge of interferences, who is empowered to hear and determine this question, and who shall give notice thereof to the registrant. If it appear after a hearing before the examiner that the registrant was not entitled to the exclusive use of the mark at or since the date of his application for registration thereof, or that the mark is not used by the registrant, or has been abandoned, and the examiner shall so decide, the commissioner shall cancel the registration. Appeal may be taken to the commissioner in person from the decision of the examiner in charge of interferences.

SEC. 3. That any person who shall willfully and with intent to deceive, affix, apply, or annex, or use in connection with any article or articles of merchandise, or any container or containers of the same, a false designation of origin, including words or other symbols, tending to falsely identify the origin of the merchandise, and shall then cause such merchandise to enter into interstate or foreign commerce, and any person who shall knowingly transport such merchandise or cause or procure the same to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes, or shall knowingly deliver the same to any carrier to be so transported, shall be liable to an action at law for damages and to an action in equity for an injunction, at the suit of any person, firm, or corporation doing business in the locality falsely indicated as that of origin, or in the region in which said locality is situated, or at the suit of any association of such persons, firms, or corporations.

SEC. 4. Any person who shall without the consent of the owner thereof reproduce, counterfeit, copy, or colorably imitate any trade-mark on the register provided by this act, and shall affix the same to merchandise of substantially the same descriptive properties as those set forth in the registration, or to labels, signs, prints, packages, wrappers, or receptacles intended to be used upon or in connection with the sale of merchandise of substantially the same descriptive properties as those set forth in such registration, and shall use, or shall have used, such reproduction, counterfeit, copy, or colorable imitation in commerce among the several States, or with a foreign nation, or with the Indian tribes, shall be liable to an action for damages therefor at the suit of the owner thereof; and whenever in any such action a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff, the court may enter judgment therein for any sum above the amount found by the verdict as the actual damages, according to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding three times the amount of such verdict, together with the costs.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of a registrant under this act to comply with the law of the country in which his original registration took place, in respect to giving notice to the public that the trade-mark is registered, in connection with the use of such trade-mark in the United States of America, and in any suit for infringement by a party failing to do this, no damages shall be recovered, except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement and continued the same after such notice.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of sections 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, and 29 of the act, approved February 20, 1905, entitled "An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks used in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States, or with Indian tribes, and to protect the same," as amended to date, are hereby made applicable to marks placed on the register provided for by section 1 of this act.

SEC. 7. That written or printed copies of any records, books, papers, or drawings belonging to the Patent Office and relating to trade-marks placed on the register provided for by this act, when authenticated by the seal of the Patent Office and certified by the commissioner thereof, shall be evidence in all cases wherein the originals could be evidence, and any person making application therefor and paying the fee required by law shall have certified copies thereof.

SEC. 8. That the same fees shall be required for certified and uncertified copies of papers and for records, transfers, and other papers, under this act, as are required by law for such copies of patents and for recording assignments and other papers relating to patents.

On filing an appeal to the Commissioner of Patents from the decision of the examiner in charge of interferences, awarding ownership of a trade-mark, canceling or refusing to cancel the registration of a trade-mark, a fee of $15 shall be payable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in connection with this bill, a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, which explains the purpose of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, July 2, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I learn with much pleasure of the introduction of a bill seeking to execute the convention concerning trade-marks signed at Buenos Aires on August 20, 1910, and ratified by the United States in the following session of Congress. The fundamental principle of the protection of prior use rather than of mere formal priority of registration is assured to the merchants and manufacturers of those Republics of America that have ratified this convention. It is to be hoped that in a relatively short time all the Republics will have so acted; to date the convention has been ratified by the United States, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Costa Rica, Brazil, Ecuador, Paraguay, and Bolivia.

After a number of attempts, the American Republics arrived at a simple but effective statement of this principle in the convention adopted in 1910. The convention provides for two international trade-mark registration bureaus—one at Habana, which will receive applications for registration from the countries of North and Central America and the West Indies, and one at Rio de Janeiro, which will receive applications for registration from the countries of South America. The two bureaus are intended to exchange each week statements of the applications received and the registrations granted. The regulations concerning the procedure of application and registration will be prepared by two international bureaus with due care and after consultation with the trade-mark registration authorities of the participating countries.

After waiting several years, and in part I think we may fairly say, as a result of the deep interest in the protection of industrial and literary property taken by the International High Commission at its meeting in Buenos Aires in April, 1916, enough ratifications were secured in the northern group of countries to make possible the inauguration of the bureau destined to serve that group. His Excellency the President of Cuba, upon receiving official notice of this fact, was able in December last to establish the International Trade-mark Registration Bureau at Habana, appointing a well-known and competent trade-mark authority of Cuba as the first director general. In the time that has elapsed since his appointment, Dr. Mario Díaz Irízar, Director General of the Bureau, has vigorously taken steps to be in a position at a very early date to receive applications for registration. The bureau may now count upon a generous appropriation toward its initial expenses made by the Cuban Congress, and, what is more noteworthy, an ample appropriation for the erection of a permanent building upon a site donated by the Cuban Government. The respective quotas of the other countries of the northern group which have ratified the convention for the first year of the operation of the bureau can be readily settled as soon as Dr. Mario Díaz Irízar comes to Washington to consult the Department of State and the Patent Office.

The legislation, the enactment of which is now thought necessary, will enable the Commissioner of Patents fully to carry out the convention in the spirit in which it was formulated at the fourth international conference of American States, in Buenos Aires, in 1910. The power of preliminary examination is essential if the Patent Office is to have the right to refuse to grant registration (so far as the United States is concerned) of trade-marks registered in the International Bureau; while provision is necessary for civil suits to prevent the use of false designations of origin, as well as for broader powers of cancellation of registration. The enactment of legislation of the character suggested—the result of long and careful study on the part of technical authorities in this special field—will enable the United States quickly to put into effect so far as depends upon the Government the provisions of the convention of 1910 and thus directly to promote the successful operation of the Habana bureau, in turn stimulating the further ratification of the convention by enough countries of South America to make possible the opening of the bureau at Rio de Janeiro. With that final step the protection of trade-marks and commercial names throughout this hemisphere will be put upon an enduring and effective basis.

I trust, my dear Senator FLETCHER, that your committee will consider this matter favorably, and I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

L. S. ROWE,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary General of the International High Commission.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until Friday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, September 13, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate September 11, 1918.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission, his present term having expired September 8, 1918.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 11, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee].

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, we approach Thee in faith and reverence, praying for Thy sustaining grace and the light of Heaven to guide these Representatives of a great people; that they may be wise in their preparations to uphold and sustain our brave boys at the front; that every means shall be provided for the speedy prosecution of the war; that militarism and autocracy may be swept from the face of the earth; that democracy may advance to the good of all Thy children, in liberty, justice, righteousness; to the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863.

The question was taken.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. DYER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question with reference to this bill. I, perhaps with a number of other Members, would like to know about the time the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will take this bill up for reading under the five-minute rule—in other words, when general debate will cease. We want to be here. I know I myself and all Members would like to be here when this bill is taken up to be read. There is not much interest in general debate, it appears from the division just had, which shows there are some 40 Members present now, and I think that is about the average who have listened to the general debate, and I would like to get some idea as to when we will really start the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule. I think the Members are entitled to that information, if it can be had.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is a bad counter; I think there are a good deal more than 40, maybe twice as many now.

Mr. DYER. I asked for a division, and the Chair counted.

Mr. KITCHIN. But a good many have come in since. I was in hopes we could finish general debate to-day, but it seems impossible, and I am pretty certain we will finish to-morrow and go into the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule on Friday.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman I have requests for six or seven hours under general debate on this side.

Mr. GILLETT. I understood the committee would take to-day, at least.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; there is only one other gentleman on our side who desires considerable time, and several will want 20 or 30 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentlemen on the committee ought to have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not over three or four on our side on the committee will speak in all, and I think we can get through by 6 o'clock to-morrow; have all day to-day and all day to-morrow. I am not inclined myself, and I do not think any man on our side is, to shut off any debate. We believe it ought to be fully debated, but I hope to get through by to-morrow by adjournment. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, our country is now engaged in the greatest war in the history of the world.

To win this war is the fixed purpose of our Government. To help win it is the highest duty of every citizen.

Money is essential and necessary for the vigorous prosecution of the war to an early and successful termination.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended and requested that $8,000,000,000 in taxes be raised in this fiscal year for the partial payment of the expenses of the war and of the Government during said year.

This bill is the response by Congress to that recommendation. It will yield the full amount requested, and several millions in addition. The response is not a partial fulfillment of the request, but a complete compliance with it.

Every request for money by the Government has been promptly responded to; there has been neither hesitancy nor delay, and Congress will continue to furnish all that may be requested to make certain and complete the success of our cause and the victory of our forces.

This bill provides for raising over $8,000,000,000 by taxation during this fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. The amount is enormous, but the expenses of war are great, and necessity demands the money. It is the largest tax bill ever presented to a legislative body in the history of the world, but we have a country richer in its resources and greater in its wealth than any other country. While there are no tax bills of other countries of such magnitude, so we have no other country with such resources and wealth. Our people are prepared to meet it and will pay the taxes gladly. They only ask that the taxes be equitably levied and the burden placed where they can be carried without too great an injury. Some of the taxes in this bill are large, very large, but it is believed that there is not a single American industry that can not pay the taxes and have sufficient money left to provide for extension of their business and pay good returns upon their invested capital.

Men should not expect or want to accumulate large fortunes or abnormal profits drawn from our people during this war. Men should not be allowed to profiteer, and the Government has not only the right but it is its duty to see that all profits above reasonable ones, based on equity and fairness, should either remain in the pockets of the people or be paid to the Government in the way of taxes. Good conscience and justice demand it, and our business men and our people approve it.

Last year a $4,000,000,000 tax bill appeared large, but we are progressing, and an $8,000,000,000 tax bill receives but little unfavorable comment from those who are to pay it.

While this bill was unanimously reported, and every item received a majority vote in committee, yet there are taxes contained therein not approved by individual Members and, in fact, objectionable to some, yet, as a completed bill, will no doubt be supported by each Member. This bill was prepared after extensive hearings, conferences with Treasury officials and experts, and long and earnest consideration by the committee.

As to the proper and best method of financing the war honest and sincere men differ. The proportion to be raised by taxation and by bonds is one upon which men may sincerely differ. I think it a wiser policy to pay as we go, as far as it is possible, and without too heavy a burden on the people. After the war heavy taxes must continue to be levied, and the more we pay the expenses by bonds the greater the interest charges must be and paid for an uncertain time in the future. It would also impose upon our soldiers fighting in this war, and who are to bring us the victory, the additional burden of paying in a large measure the expenses of the war.

The committee was advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that the estimated expenses of the Government for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, would be about $24,000,000,000. This amount included the usual monthly loans to our allies of $500,000,000, or $6,000,000,000 during the year. Our contract with the allies provides for the repayment of this money with interest at the rate of at least what we pay upon our bonds. This reduces our own expenses to $18,000,000,000, but the amount will be increased before the end of the year. If this amount represents our entire expenses, we will raise by taxation about 45 per cent of the entire sum.

Our war expenses are necessarily very large, but instead of being discouraged by the magnitude of the figures our people courageously and gladly respond to the demand. The plans, enormous in their magnitude, for pushing this war to an early and successful termination, have inspired the people to meet every demand made by the President, and those charged with the responsibility of carrying on this war, and mere money will not be considered in the unchangeable purpose to win it.

The resolution declaring the existence of a state of war pledged all the resources of the country to its successful termination. We voted for that resolution, and we will not hesitate to carry out its promises and pledges. Our people have not hesitated or delayed in the part they have been called upon to do, and while this bill imposes great burdens, they will be assumed with cheerfulness and fulfilled with fidelity.

The money raised by this bill will be used to equip, provide, and care for our soldiers and sailors, and will carry cheer and encouragement to them. They will know that their every need will be promptly supplied. They are brave, courageous, and valiant, and have won the love, respect, and admiration of the world by their strength and fighting qualities on the bloody battle fields of France. They are the best soldiers in the world. They are the best fed, best clothed, best equipped, and best cared for soldiers in the war, and this bill will give them ample assurance that those conditions are to continue and that their wants and needs are uppermost in the thoughts of the people back home.

They are making the real sacrifices of the war, giving their lives for their country—the supreme sacrifice. How small indeed is the sacrifice we are laying upon the people when we seek only money, and that, too, from those who are able to pay. We are taking only from the earnings and profits of business, and leaving the capital and a reasonable profit intact. How many mothers and fathers of the boys over there would cheerfully give all their property for the absolute certainty that their son would return in safety, strong and loving as he left them a short time ago.

We believe the profits of those who are piling up dollars by reason of the war should first be reached before we invade the small earnings of those less able to pay. We have gone on the theory that the great mass of the people with small earnings should not be called upon in large numbers until those who have made abnormal profits have contributed a fair proportion of what they have made. Those who have profited financially by reason of this war must make liberal contribution under this bill, but justice and equity demand it, and the people will approve it.

This bill will take, through the individual income tax, from their incomes and earnings $1,482,186,000 during this fiscal year. It provides for liberal credits, and gives an exemption of $2,000 to a married man and $1,000 to a single man, with an additional $200 exemption for each dependent. The rate upon incomes of $4,000 and under is but 6 per cent, and these taxes will be paid by a very large number; the amount of taxes in the aggregate will be large, yet comparatively small in each individual case. Above this amount the normal tax is 12 per cent, and the supertaxes begin at $5,000.

The following table shows the income tax levied under existing law and levied under the proposed bill for specified incomes of married persons without dependents and without dividends from corporations or interest from tax-free securities:

The Treasury Department estimates that in 1917 there were about 615,000 individuals with an income above $4,000 per annum and 2,440,000 with taxable incomes of $4,000 or less.

The total taxable income was $7,400,000,000 and of income subject to normal tax, $4,700,000,000. It is estimated that the individual normal income tax will yield $414,000,000 and the surtaxes $1,068,186,000, making the total individual income tax $1,482,186,000. This will allow the individuals paying said taxes the sum of $5,917,814,000, or nearly 75 per cent of their total taxable incomes. This tax is taken entirely from incomes and the burden in paid in proportion to the incomes and the individual's ability to pay. In the calendar year ending December 31, 1916, personal returns in the number of 437,036 were filed, showing an aggregate income of $6,298,577,620. The income tax amounted to $173,386,694. More than one-fourth of the total net income reported was returned by persons with incomes of from $3,000 to $10,000, nearly one-half by those with incomes from $3,000 to $30,000, and more than three-fourths with incomes less than $150,000. While 98½ per cent of the returns filed showed incomes less than $100,000, the 1½ per cent showing incomes of $100,000 and over represented nearly one-third of the total net incomes and nearly three-fourths of the total tax. This bill does not impose an income tax on partnerships, but provides that each partner will pay his income tax upon his share of the profits of the partnership, whether the same are distributed or not.

This bill provides that more than one-half of its total of $8,000,000,000 will be in taxes from the earnings and profits of corporations. These corporations are allowed reasonable profits and liberal deductions before the taxes are imposed upon the net income. They deduct all the ordinary and necessary expenses in carrying on the business, including reasonable salaries for personal services actually rendered, rental, and all other necessary expenses; all interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on its indebtedness; taxes, except income taxes and war or excess-profits taxes, paid or accrued within taxable year; losses sustained and charged off, worthless debts, dividends from other corporations, allowances for wear and tear of property, amortization in case of buildings, machinery, or other factories constructed for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war, special deductions for mines, oil and gas wells. Then certain credits are allowed before the corporation tax is levied: Amount of interest upon bonds or obligations of the Government, or any State, Territory, or political subdivision, which is included in their gross income, also the amount of any war profit or excess-profit taxes, and in addition $2,000.

Under the act of 1916 the corporation tax was 2 per cent upon the net income, with no allowance for deduction of dividends received from another corporation. The act of 1917 levied an addditional tax of 4 per cent on corporations, but allowed a corporation to deduct amount of dividehd received from other corporations. This bill allows similar deductions to the law of 1917 and levies a tax of 18 per cent upon the net income after allowance for credits and deductions, and provides the tax shall be 12 per cent upon that portion of said net income that does not exceed the sum paid in dividends during the taxable year, and in addition the amount paid during the taxable year out of the earnings and profits in discharge of bonds and other interest-paying obligations outstanding prior to the beginning of such year. It is estimated from this corporation tax the Government will receive $894,000,000.

In addition to the corporation income tax, this bill provides for an excess-profits tax or a war-profits tax. Each corporation subject to its provisions must file a return which will show the amount of taxes it would be liable to pay under each method of calculation, and must pay the tax computed according to that method which yields the highest amount of taxes. The war-profit method provides for a tax of 80 per cent upon the amount of the net income in excess of the average net income for the prewar years 1911, 1912, and 1913 and a credit of $3,000. In case the average net income of a corporation for the prewar years was less than 10 per cent of its invested capital, a corporation will be allowed to deduct from its net income an amount equal to 10 per cent of its invested capital, plus $3,000, before applying the 80 per cent rate.

In cases where this method of calculation is used and the taxes to be paid are less than when calculated under the excess-profit method, the latter method is used, and the taxes are to be paid under its provisions. The method of determining the taxes under the excess profits is as follows: A credit of $3,000 plus 8 per cent of the invested capital of the corporation for the taxable year is allowed. This amount is to be deducted from the net profits, and the tax will be computed on the following basis: Thirty-five per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profit credits and not in excess of 15 per cent of such invested capital for the taxable year; 50 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital; and 70 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of such capital. The corporate net income from 1909 to 1918 is as follows:

Corporate net income, 1909 to 1918.

Year.	Net income.
1909	$3,500,000,000
1910	3,761,000,000
1911	3,593,000,000
1912	4,151,000,000
1913	4,714,000,000
1914	3,940,000,000
1915	5,310,000,000
1916	8,765,900,000
1917 (estimated)	10,500,000,000
1918 (estimated)	10,000,000,000

It is estimated that the revenue from the excess-profits and war-profits taxes for 1918 will be $3,200,000,000 and from income taxes on corporations $894,000,000, in all $4,094,000,000. This will leave in the treasury of said corporations after payment of taxes $5,906,000,000. This amount is larger than the total net incomes of corporations for either 1914 or 1915 or any year prior thereto. In other words, after the payment of these taxes proposed in this bill the corporations will have larger profits than any year from 1909 to 1915, inclusive.

While the taxes are large, very large, yet the corporations will pay these out of profits, after allowing most liberal deductions and credits, and when paid will have $1,966,000,000 more than their total income in 1914 and $596,000,000 more than they made in 1915, when their profits were abnormally high by reason of the war. They will retain about 59 per cent of their net profits after all salaries and expenses, including income, excess-profits, or war-profits taxes.

There have been a number of changes in the provisions of the estate tax for the purpose of simplification and clearness, and the rates have been increased 50 per cent to estates of $8,000,000 and under and slightly above that per cent for larger estates.

The rates on transportation of freight and express have not been changed nor have the rates upon the transportation of persons. The rates on telegraph and telephone messages have been changed. Under the present law a tax of 5 cents is levied upon messages where the charge is 15 cents or more. Under this bill messages where the charges are more than 14 cents and not more than 50 cents are taxed 5 cents. Where the charges are more than 50 cents the tax is 10 cents.

The tax on beverages has been greatly increased; on distilled spirits for beverage purposes from $3.20 to $8 per gallon and on spirits for other purposes the present rates are doubled. The rates on beer and wines were doubled.

For the purpose of securing a larger revenue from soft drinks there is imposed a tax of 30 per cent upon the manufacturer's price of cereal beverages and 20 per cent upon the manufacturer's price of other soft drinks. Under the proposed bill a tax of 2 cents for each 10 cents of the selling price will be imposed upon soft drinks mixed at the place of retail sale and upon ice-cream sodas and other similar articles of food. Upon sales amounting to 7 cents or less the tax is 1 cent. It is estimated that from beverages alone the taxes will yield $1,137,600,000.

The taxes upon tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes have been doubled in some cases and increased in all cases, and it is estimated that from these sources the Government will receive in taxes $341,204,000, an increase of about $130,000,000 over existing law.

The tax on admissions and dues have been doubled and the estimated revenue increased from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000.

The excise taxes proposed in this bill are levied upon articles that are either luxuries in themselves or become a luxury in the opinion of the committee when bought at more than the fixed price named in the bill. There is necessarily a difference of opinion as to many of these articles. What is a luxury to one person may be regarded as a necessity to another. These selections were made for the purpose of revenue, and when applied to articles selling above the fixed price it is the opinion that the tax will have a tendency to curtail purchases and reduce extravagance. Many of the articles enumerated under excise taxes are of absolute necessity, yet as the tax upon those articles only applies to the prices in excess of the reasonably high figures proposed in the bill it is not believed that the great mass of the people will be affected by the tax. Those who will be called upon to pay will be those who can afford to pay. Most of us buy these articles for amounts less than the exempted figures.

In addition to the excise taxes, there are a number of special taxes levied in this bill simply for revenue purposes. The money is needed, and the people who are called upon to pay it can well afford to contribute to their Government from their profits. Many new items are incorporated in this bill. These special taxes, it is estimated, will yield the Government about $165,000,000.

The stamp taxes provided for in this bill simply reenact the existing law, the rates remaining the same except as to playing cards, and these rates were fixed at what was estimated to be the largest revenue-producing rate, the money to be collected therefrom being alone considered in fixing the rate.

One of the most important provisions of the bill was the creation of an advisory tax board, to consist of five members, appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and the tenure of office fixed to terminate one year after the termination of the war. This will provide a means whereby any taxpayer can have his individual case submitted to this board upon any question relating to the interpretation or administration of the internal-revenue laws, and this board will report its findings and recommendations to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This provision will give to the business man an opportunity to present his case in full to a board clothed with authority to report its findings and recommendations, and no doubt the recommendations will be approved. This will assure business men of a hearing and that justice and equity will be applied in their cases where appeal to this board is made. These are the main features of this bill. Many administrative provisions have been inserted, some changing existing and many being new provisions, but all intended to simplify the administration of the law. This bill seeks to correct the inequity in the operation of the present law, repeals most of the revenue acts of 1916 and 1917, and incorporates most of their provisions therein. The administration features make the collection of the taxes simple and easy.

This law, made necessary by reason of the war, would not be enacted in times of peace. It is, in fact, a war measure, and with peace will come the repeal of many of its provisions and modification and radical changes in those that remain in the law.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask this leave at this time for the reason that I have no formal address prepared to present to the membership of this House. I expect, as do the other members of the Ways and Means Committee, when this bill is finally considered, to vote for its passage. I shall vote for it as a completed war measure, as I have voted for every completed war measure presented since the declaration of war.

Three months the Ways and Means Committee, during the heated season, labored in the production of this stupendous measure. There were those who likened their labors to the mountain in travail. But there were none hardy enough to suggest that out of that great travail of the mountain a mouse was brought forth. There may be those, and probably are, who claim that a monster was produced. But it is not of such frightful mien but that we can accept it. It is a measure somewhat in harmony with the events and conditions of the world. This is a day and age when we talk of men numbered in millions. We talk of money counted in billions. Races are at war and continents contend. The underseas have become the lair of the enemy, while the domain of the eagle has become the battle field of the world. So the bill we present, large in its terms and perhaps grievous in its burdens, is in entire harmony with the progressive movements of the world in this its most critical epoch.

I shall not hold you long, for the reason that the bill and its many features have been well explained and ably discussed. I shall devote myself to but a few features which appeal to me. The speech of the minority ranking member [Mr. FORDNEY] opened with an American poem inspiring to all of us. It depicts a son, whom the writer called "Bill," typifying the American soldier as a unit of America's fighting force. The unit of America's fighting force is now the effective significant unit of the fighting force of the world.

He spoke of him as "Our Bill." This great measure, laying its stupendous burden upon the people, is to provide for "Our Bill" that "Our Bill" may do the other "Bill." It is a mighty, golden sword placed in the hands of "Our Bill" with which to slay that worse than dragon, the other Bill. [Applause.]

Two serious breaks have occurred over on the western front recently. One was a break of the Hindenburg line, inspired by "Our Bill." The other was led by the other Bill, a break for the banks of the Rhine [applause], all inspired by "Our Bill." And the Teuton monarch is being followed, mind you, by the Teuton hordes toward safety beyond the Rhine. Speed to the pursued, but greater speed to the pursuer. [Applause.] Because just in that kind of a situation we find an opportunity for the slaughter or the capture of an army, which is necessary before there will be a decision in this war. We are wagering the amount of this bill on "Our Bill" beating the Hun Bill, and I do not believe the Reichstag will cover it.

Now, then, this bill which we have for consideration might be taken up in a great deal of detail. For two days the eloquent, witty, logical—sometimes—chairman discussed the measure which is partly the product of his creative brain. I thought, after listening to him for those two days, and recalling that one of the bases for the production of revenue was talking machines, that this would lead me to approve the tax in this bill on talking machines.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield to the genial gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very sorry the gentleman has given this trend to his remarks, because we have very high authority for the statement at this time "politics is adjourned."

Mr. SLOAN. Yes. I, too, thought that politics was adjourned. I think it is adjourned up here on the Capitoline hill, but not so on the Palatine. They are as active over on Palatine as they were since 1913, and that is strong tribute for political activity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was dragging the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] into politics. That is what I objected to.

Mr. SLOAN. I was about to prophesy that, in a measure, he would be dragged out of politics. I assume the gentleman's objections are purely Pickwickian.

I shall confine myself largely to two features of the bill, both of which are features of absence and exclusion rather than features present. I refer first especially to the fact that there is no impost duty levied in this measure.

I can not understand what degree of prejudice, because I can attribute it to nothing else, led to this feature of a revenue measure being omitted, unless we are to look over our glorious past, in every war that we have had, and the mighty men who controlled our financial affairs, and condemn them as proceeding without political wisdom and without financial acumen. During every war that America has waged up to this time a substantial part of our revenues has been from collections at our ports. This is the first war, as it is the mightiest, when we find import duties practically neglected. Of course, we have the Underwood tariff law, which produces a beggarly amount of money. Did you ever think that during the course of this war that of the many slackers within our borders the Underwood tariff bill stands indicted as the worst slacker in America, considering the functions that it was supposed to perform? Last year our tariff law, known as the Underwood tariff law, produced only $179,000,000. That was a law said to be for the production of revenue, but it never had any such function. It was simply a legislative device for the suppression of revenue, an aid to the foreigner, and encouragement of the issuance of bonds in time of peace as well as war. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We financed the war of 1812 by revenues consisting of 92 per cent collected at the ports and the internal revenues of three one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Yet up to this time I never heard anybody complain of the financial management of those in authority during 1812, 1813, and 1814.

In the Mexican War—and we remember who were in power at that time—we collected at the ports 89 per cent of all our revenues and in internal revenue fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Up to this time the financial management of that war I have never heard condemned. No political convention condemned the system of financial management of the affairs of state during our war with Mexico.

During our own Civil War—the mightiest struggle in the world up to the one in which we are now engaged—of the revenues collected 61 per cent were collected at the ports, 31 per cent internal revenue, and the remaining portion, of course, being from public lands, and so on. And yet we look back with approval of the financial management of this Nation during the Civil War. In fact, it was the amount of money, the gold or its equivalent, collected at the ports that gave such stability as we had to our financial and monetary conditions in that eventful period of American history.

In 1898, during the Spanish-American War, the revenues collected at the ports amounted to 36 per cent of all the revenues collected during that famous struggle. But now, engaged in a great war, when theoretically a tariff for revenue would have been given its greatest opportunity, we are to collect at the ports this coming year, assuming that the collections will be equal to the past fiscal year, 2½ per cent of our national revenues. I call your attention to the relative percentages of duties collected on all goods during former wars. For instance, during the Civil War, four years, the average duty on all goods shipped into this country amounted to 31 per cent. In the Spanish-American War the average duty on all—and that includes the dutiable and those that came in free—was 27.13 per cent. But for the year 1918 the average rate paid at our ports upon all goods imported, free and dutiable, amounted to 6.28 per cent. And yet this year past we had the largest importations of foreign goods in all the history of the Republic, amounting in value, in round figures, to $2,946,000,000. We did not find the burden of the tariff during the Civil War grievous. If we had applied the average rates during the Civil War upon the goods that have just been shipped into this country, we would have collected $900,000,000 instead of $179,000,000, so that there has been loss to the American Treasury through the inexcusable prejudice of those in power of $721,000,000. We find considerable fault, and justly, that an administration that handled the aeroplane fund with such misfortune—to call it nothing baser; with such lack of wisdom and prudence, to call it nothing worse—should have recommended that the House of Representatives and the coordinate body sit quietly by here in America and, in the interest of the foreigner, against the best interests of the American people, and to the prejudice of the Treasury, which needed the money, collected only $179,000,000 duties when we should have collected more than $900,000,000.

It was said by the chairman that that would place a tax upon the consumers of this country. That would seem quite an argument against many tariff planks we used to read in a great many presidential platforms. But in this case it is not correct. Who thinks for one moment that a tariff, whether it is a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only, now collected at the ports, finds it way, in nearly all cases, to the consumer? Prices of articles sold now are not measured by items of cost such as the tariff collected at the ports. Prices are fixed now in the purchase and sale of articles largely upon the necessities of the purchaser and the opportunity of the seller. Who for one moment thinks that the hotel man here, with the prices he exacts, considers for one moment any duty he might have paid upon any importation or upon any article in competition with any imported article? No more does he think of it than did two men with whom I had a recent experience. Coming from New York to Washington, I had two mishaps, pretty nearly the same. I stopped at the wayside garages to have them adjusted. In the case of the first it was adjusted, and the price was $1.30. Fifty miles farther on a similar mishap to the twin part of the machine occurred, entailing the same amount of work, and the charge there was $5.50. It was not a question of figuring costs. Men do not figure those matters entirely on items of cost. They embrace the opportunity, based upon the necessity of the purchaser and the opportunity of the seller. So that we, with all our machinery for the collection of duties at the ports, are simply collecting $179,000,000 when we should collect $900,000,000. We lose $720,000,000 on this basis.

Before the committee—and I violate no confidence, of course, in speaking of such matters in general terms—the discussion was all revenue. The chairman said something about the matter of protection. Protection was not mooted, so far as I knew. Revenue collected at the ports was urged. We did not propose at this time to cast our protective pearls before the members of an adverse Ways and Means Committee, but we did insist upon raising revenues. We did that because we thought of America first and Americans first, and not in the interest of the foreign laborer, the foreign producer, or anyone outside of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question on that subject?

Mr. SLOAN. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood the gentleman's statement was that we now raise 6 per cent, on the average, upon imports.

Mr. SLOAN. Six and twenty-eight one-hundredths per cent for the last year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And under the duty of the Payne bill we would raise $900,000,000?

Mr. SLOAN. No; that was during the Civil War. That would be 31 per cent, which was the average rate upon all importations, free and dutiable, during the Civil War.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much did the gentleman reckon the rate would be to raise the amount he suggested—$900,000,000 upon imports?

Mr. SLOAN. Now?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Thirty-one per cent. That is, if we were to adopt the average rate which was in force during the Civil War we would raise now instead of $179,000,000 over $900,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, in spreading that rate of 31 per cent over articles that might be imported, it would add a very small amount, would it not, to the price of the articles if it were added?

Mr. SLOAN. If it were added it would amount to very little, and would probably, in nearly all the cases, have no account taken of it. It is a free gift that we are making to the world now, whereas we should bring the money into the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the case of shoes, to give a concrete example, as I understand it, hides came in free and shoes have increased in price from two to three times. Can the gentleman tell us what is the cause of such an increase as that?

Mr. SLOAN. I can. I think I have given it twice. That is, they have fixed the price not upon the cost of production, but they have fixed it largely upon the necessity of the purchaser and the opportunity of the seller.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Arbitrarily?

Mr. SLOAN. Arbitrarily during these war times. There never was such a time or such an opportunity for a tariff for revenue only to work out according to the theory that we have listened to now for 50 years as there is now, and yet we could not induce the members of the Ways and Means Committee to take their own political medicine.

During the Spanish War the average duty spread over the dutiable and undutiable list was 27.13 per cent. If we were to adopt the same plan now that we did then we would be saving each year $620,000,000. More than that, the average rate on all the goods imported into this country in the 20 years from 1898, after the repeal of the Wilson tariff bill, up to the present time is 24.29 per cent. If we were to adopt that and spread it over the imports of 1918 we would have saved the people of the United States over $500,000,000.

But it was remarked in a colloquy between the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] that if we put on these duties we would be putting them on against our allies. Well, if that be true, I am sorry that the same tender consideration has not been exercised by those whom we term the allies, because Britain collected last year of its revenues 13 per cent in import duties, more than twice the rate that we collected. Over here in Canada 58 per cent of their collections are made at the ports. So that as a matter of experience in American history in all our wars and in that period of our Nation's history where at least the greatest prosperity occurred the duties collected at the ports bore the large burden of paying the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I do.

Mr. SNYDER. Based on the figures that the gentleman just stated, the United States to-day is the greatest free-trade country in the world?

Mr. SLOAN. The greatest that I know anything about, because France, we know, and Germany—although, of course, it is interfered with by war—are strongly protective countries. So is Italy. Of all the civilized nations on earth the United States comes the nearest to being a free-trade Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me 20 or 30 minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 20 additional minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. In the face of America's more than a century of experience in financing peace measures, as well as those of war, we practically reject the best means of financial grace that are held out to us and throw into the sea multiplied millions when we need the money.

We have had in recent years a legislative and executive iconoclasm which finds expression in the aphorism, "Whatever is is wrong." A careful inventory of our last five years of legislation will amaze Americans on the extent to which the foregoing policy has been followed. On some other occasion I shall go into details; but for the purpose here it is sufficient to allude to the complete reversal of all the policies proven in a century and a third to be sound and the adoption of policies which, however glittering and seductive, carry much danger to the welfare and even life of the Republic.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have been unfortunate in not having heard all of the gentleman's remarks, and therefore he may have covered this matter. Has the gentleman paid any attention to the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] that most of the additional imports that we have had in the last two years have been articles that were free listed under both preceding tariff bills?

Mr. SLOAN. I paid considerable attention to that, but it was fully answered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in his elaborate discussion of that precise point. So I did not prepare and do not care to present any figures on that. I refer the gentleman to the answer to that precise question by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], which fully answers it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Even conceding that to be true, as the chairman of the committee said, is it also true that there would have been approximately $900,000,000 taken in, even if there had been large additional imports of free-listed articles?

Mr. SLOAN. There would have been a very large amount. I desire the gentleman to understand my precise statement, that spreading the duties over all the imports as they were during the Dingley and Payne tariff régimes, it would average 24.29 per cent on all articles, free and dutiable. Assuming that we would make the same general spread now, I multiplied it and found the result as I have stated, a loss of more than $500,000,000. That $500,000,000, I will say to my friend, would go a long way now toward taking the place of that which we are going to lose by reason of prohibition. But whether we give it that place or use it elsewhere we could have collected from the foreigners these multiplied millions, and we would not have had to resort to a heavy tax on the chewing gum of the children or the soap of the family. Nor would we have been required to take advantage of dead men in order to collect taxes from their estates, taxes which distinctively belong to the States and not to the Federal Government.

The other proposition that I desire to address myself to, and the absence of which from the bill I desire to criticize, is this: It is one matter to lay a heavy taxing hand upon the American people and compel them to pay heavy tribute from that which they have or may earn. It is another and just as important—a really more important—thing to see that that money is properly expended and that criminal waste is not indulged in by those whose duty it is to expend. For that reason it has been urged in season and out of season by the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee that we ought to have a bipartisan committee on war expenditures.

I do not violate any confidence when I say that a year ago it was the will of this side of the House and the concession of the leadership of that side of the House that such a committee should be authorized and appointed. It was provided for at the other end of this Capitol. But one of those anticipatory vetoes came in. So we have no such committee. As a result of not having it we have the delectable memory of Hog Island and the aircraft fiasco. I venture to say that if such a committee had been organized, made up from both sides of this House and the Senate, the great aircraft fiasco, which is now the major tragedy and the premier scandal of the war, would never have occurred.

One serious trouble in not having such a committee during these times is, first, that all the people of the United States who contribute to these vast exactions and who bear these great burdens want to know that they are represented somewhere effectively by their friends in seeing that the money is not extravagantly disposed of. [Applause.] More than that, they want to know that hereafter when they pay taxes or when they invest otherwise in response to Government appeal, that money shall be husbanded and not wasted.

Another reason for it is personal to Members, and that is that had we such a committee it would relieve Members of this body from calling attention to important facts which are as distasteful to us as to those whom we criticize.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. A few moments ago the gentleman stated that he thought that the prices of to-day were based upon the necessity of the consumer and the opportunity of the producer.

Mr. SLOAN. Very largely; not entirely.

Mr. SNYDER. I think that is a pretty broad statement.

Mr. SLOAN. I intended it to be so.

Mr. SNYDER. My judgment is that a vast amount of the business that is being done in this country to-day is still being done on the basis of a fair profit to each man who handles the product as it moves along from the producer to the purchaser. I do not think things have quite got into the state of affairs that the gentleman means to indicate. My statement is in defense of the large number of business men in this country who, I believe, are honest and patriotic.

Mr. SLOAN. I make no charge against the honesty or patriotism of any business man, and especially not against the gentleman, who is an excellent business man, and those whom he represents. But men make their charges largely with reference to the charges that they expect to submit to when they meet the next man, as well as the large feature of cost.

Mr. SNYDER. I can readily understand the personal experience that the gentleman had in coming over from New York in his automobile, but I do not think that is a fair comparison to apply to the great business of this country to-day.

Mr. SLOAN. Well, I am willing to leave the statement as it is modified. What I desire to call attention to is that the largest monetary asset of America now—that is, of the Treasury—is the evidences of indebtedness held by the United States against foreign countries. These do not appear in the daily report of the Treasury, although some of us think they should be scheduled there as are the other national documentary assets. This Congress authorized munificent loans to be made to those who are fighting with us against the common enemy. I voted for it. It seemed necessary and wise. This applies not only to what has been done but what may be done; but it is a fact that in the history of this legislation we first authorized the establishment of credits in the sum of $3,000,000,000. The authority which I shall furnish for the RECORD is in section 2 of Public Document No. 3, Sixty-fifth Congress:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act; to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

It provides for establishing credit with foreign governments; it also provides for taking bonds of the foreign countries at the same rate that we then loaned our money and under practically the same terms. No provision is made for short-time loans in this act and none were contemplated. Loans have been made, as I am advised, by the Treasury Department, September 4, 1918, of $6,337,764,750. There have been authorized $7,098,706,666. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury makes this statement:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 4, 1918.

DEAR MR. SLOAN: Your letter of August 28 has been duly received. At the close of business September 3 credits had been established in favor of foreign governments, and cash advances made, as follows:

	Credits established.	Cash advances.
Belgium	$154,250,000	$144,030,000
Cuba	15,000,000	5,000,000
France	2,065,000,000	1,780,000,000
Great Britain	3,745,000,000	3,482,000,000
Greece	15,790,000
Italy	760,000,000	730,000,000
Roumania	6,666,666
Russia	325,000,000	187,729,750
Serbia	12,000,000	9,005,000
Total	7,098,706,666	6,337,764,750

The obligations received from foreign Governments are in the form of, or are held as, demand notes, carrying interest at rates not less than those borne by the respective issues of liberty bonds of the United States, and the Treasury Department receives assurances from the Department of State as to the authority of the foreign representatives to execute the obligations on behalf of their respective Governments.

Very truly, yours,

R. C. LEFFINGWELL,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. CHARLES H. SLOAN,

I think it is the general understanding of the American people, and has been up to this time, that bonds for these loans have been taken. The facts are that we now hold the diplomatic notes of the various nations for that amount and have no bonds.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please state those amounts again?

Mr. SLOAN. The authorization is $7,098,706,666. The actual cash advanced was $6,337,764,750, making that the largest asset of our National Treasury, nearly 50 per cent more than all the gold and silver and other valuables held in the Treasury of the United States.

I believed it was good policy then, and I believe it is good policy now, that when we take securities from other countries we demand the same formalities from those other countries that every purchaser of an American bond demands from this Government in the purchase of every American bond. There should be connected with it a statement not only of the amount but the period for which it will run, the legislative authority for which the obligation was contracted, and the funds from which payments may be made during the course of years. If we issue a bond for 30 years and invest in a foreign bond, which is entirely proper under my view, we should have a bond similar in terms as to time, amount, and rate of interest. As the report of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in recommending that bill which became a law on the 26th of April, 1917, said:

The bill as heretofore stated authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to extend credits not to exceed $3,000,000,000 to foreign governments. It authorizes the purchase with the proceeds from the sale of these bonds, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, of the obligations of foreign governments bearing the same rate of interest and containing essentially the same terms and conditions as the bonds issued under authority of this act. It provides, however, that should any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations be converted into United States bonds bearing a rate of interest higher than 3½ per cent, that in that event the obligations of the foreign governments held by the United States shall be converted into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the like bonds of the United States. It will, therefore, be observed that the $3,000,000,000 credit proposed to be extended to foreign governments will take care of itself and will not constitute an indebtedness that will have to be met by taxation in the future.

In a later enactment, which I shall supply in the RECORD, there was given the Secretary, on account of the fact that it took some time to obtain these securities, authority to take short-time notes and provided for the conversion of those short-time notes into long-time notes.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to establish credits with the United States for any foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States; and, to the extent of the credits so established from time to time, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase, at par, from such foreign governments, respectively, their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act or of such act approved April 24, 1917, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign governments and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which at the time of the acquisition thereof shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligations shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine for the conversion of a proportionate part of such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, but the rate of interest in such foreign obligations issued upon such conversion shall not be less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to enter into such arrangements from time to time with any such foreign governments as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for the payment of such obligations of foreign governments before maturity. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000,000,000, and in addition thereto the unexpended balance of the appropriations made by section 2 of said act approved April 24, 1917, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits for foreign governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, from time to time, to exercise in respect to any obligations of foreign governments acquired under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, any privilege of conversion into obligations bearing interest at a higher rate provided for in or pursuant to this act or said act approved April 24, 1917, and to convert any short-time obligations of foreign governments which may have been purchased under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, into long-time obligations of such foreign governments, respectively, maturing not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, as the case may be, and in such form and terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations; and, under such terms and conditions as he may from time to time prescribe, to receive payment, on or before maturity, of any obligations of such foreign governments acquired on behalf of the United States under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, and, with the approval of the President, to sell any of such obligations (but not at less than the purchase price with accrued interest unless otherwise hereafter provided by law), and to apply the proceeds thereof, and any payments so received from foreign governments on account of the principal of their said obligations, to the redemption or purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of any bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917; and if such bonds can not be so redeemed or purchased the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem or purchase any other outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to redemption or which can be purchased at not more than par and accrued interest.

It will be observed that the act of April 24, 1918, contemplates only the taking of bonds corresponding in terms with those the Government sold, the proceeds of which were to be loaned to the foreign Governments.

The act of September 24 authorizes in a manner constituting practically a command that the short-term loans to other countries should be converted into bonds. There were no short-term loans so authorized in the act of April 24. They were taken, however, and the excuse sufficient probably under the circumstances to meet the mechanical difficulties of completing the transfer of credits. A year and a half should be more than ample time for the purpose of completing the transaction.

In any event the $3,000,000,000 loan authorized and made under the first act should have this permanent evidence of indebtedness in the highest form of international financial paper in the possession of our Treasury. So that, as we have issued our long-term obligations for the purpose of making these loans, and will have to pay them in the future years, we should then have the foreign similar bonds with which to meet them.

As to those loans made under the act of September 24, 1918, and later, I consider the intent of the legislation was to take bonds similar in term to those we issued. I further deem it sound financial policy so to do.

I believe it is proper to say at this time that the American people will expect the conversion of these diplomatic notes and

I. O. U.'s into formal bonds, executed with due formality, backed up by the legislative authority of the borrowing nation. It is nothing more than right. It is good business, because short settlements between individuals make long friends, and short settlements undoubtedly in this new departure of business between nations will tend to make long friends. For that reason I call the attention of the House that it would undoubtedly have been an important fact for a by-partisan committee of the House and Senate to have taken cognizance of and given it attention and publicity in the country, so that the original intent of the Congress of the United States, especially as to the first three billions of foreign loans, would have long before this been carried out.

This is a large measure, the largest measure which in a financial way was ever brought before this or any other legislative body. It involves $8,000,000,000, which is equal to all the money gold of the world. It involves half of the gold produced in the world since Columbus discovered America. It involves three times the amount of silver produced in the world in the last 500 years. If we were to reduce the $8,000,000,000 to gold and then to double eagles, it would pave Pennsylvania Avenue from the Anacostia River to the Georgetown bridge. If reduced to gold and distributed along the translucent path of the heavens, it would make the Milky Way look like a golden street. The interest upon it, if we were to borrow it at the current rates, would amount to twice the amount of collections that we get from the Underwood bill in a year. It is hard to conceive the real magnitude of the bill. All that we can do is think of the necessities and the successful prosecution of the war, vote for it, and then take such steps later on, if we can not in this bill, to see to it that the $8,000,000,000 collected from the American people are not in any way wasted. [Applause.] I know no better method of making this a popular tax measure than to incorporate in it a provision for a bipartisan committee of the House and Senate with authority, not to hamper the administration but to aid it, not to interfere with the conduct of the war but to look after the great expenditures of the war. It will inspire a confidence in the American taxpayer that will be worth billions to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. SLOAN. I believe no better provision could be adopted, in view of the mighty liberty-bond drive that is soon to begin, than to set aside some of our flaming posters, dispense with some of our spectacular "movie" stars, that entertained but did not reassure the public in the last drive, cancel some expensive meetings, and advertise throughout America that the Congress of the United States has determined that there shall not be any waste, has elected six of its best business Senators from both sides of that historic aisle and seven of the ablest business men who grace this great Chamber, representing both sides of this aisle, and has endowed them with authority to examine into the large expenditures of money collected by taxation and money obtained through the sale of bonds. The American people would be inspired by that pillar of security, if I may so call it, and they would buy with more freedom the fourth liberty bonds than they have purchased the first, second, or third. Confidence can best be inspired in the American people when it is known that not only are all of the American people called upon to pay, but, more than that, that all the people of America are represented among those who shall see how the money is expended.

This measure calls for sacrifice. It calls for sacrifice on the part of those who have and those who earn. Ungrudging financial tribute should not be difficult to obtain even though inequities may appear in a bill written with imperfect information, by imperfect men, using imperfect language. But the great sacrifices are not by those who pay nor by those who buy. The great sacrifices are made by the givers of men, the mothers; not by the bank presidents, by the wives; not by the railway magnates, by the sweethearts and sisters; not by the recipients of great incomes. The precious gifts in this war are the millions of the images of their Maker, moving in militant wrath over the fields of France to a decisive victory and a lasting peace. [Applause.] When their valor has made of Europe what it should be, a continent of composed nations and not an armed camp, I trust that they may return to their own country and find it as it was and in possession of all its liberties and independence, as it ever should be. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who has charge of the time upon this side, to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] 40 minutes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the details of this bill. That has been done so thoroughly by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and by other members of the committee that I am sure every Member who has cared to know the details of the bill has had ample opportunity to learn them. I shall content myself with a few general observations concerning some of the things in the bill and concerning some things not in the bill.

It is not strictly true for us to say this is a nonpartisan revenue bill. The general policy of the bill is the policy of the Democratic Party. It is the policy of the party in power. The President indicated to Congress that the revenues should be raised by a tax on incomes, on excess profits, and on luxuries.

The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means accepted that as the policy that should be pursued in raising this needed revenue. I think every member of the minority realized that the majority had the right under our form of government to lay down the general financial policy of the country, and in that view and in that spirit the minority members of the committee accepted the plan that is in this bill as the plan on which we would undertake to produce eight billions of revenue. But when we have passed that point I am sure that this bill is nonpartisan. I think I am safe in saying that the Republican members of the committee worked as diligently and had as much to do with arranging the details and fixing the plans of the bill under that general policy as had the Democrats, and suggestions from Republican members were given the same fair consideration by the chairman and by the committee as were the suggestions of Democratic members. Every suggestion and every idea coming from either side of the table was treated by the committee purely in a nonpartisan spirit and with the sole aim of giving to the House the best possible bill for its consideration.

I think if the Republicans had been in the majority the general policy of the bill would have been somewhat different. I have no doubt that much of this money would have been raised under a Republican administration from the very same sources that this bill raises it, but a Republican administration would have incorporated into the bill other features that would have been of vast importance to the American people and to American industry.

The Treasury Department estimated that it would be necessary to produce revenue to the amount of $24,000,000,000 for this current year and suggested that 33⅓ per cent of it be produced by taxation. There has been a great deal of discussion on the floor of the House as to just what is the fair and proper proportion of the needed war revenue that should be raised by taxation and what proportion by the sale of Government bonds.

At the last session of Congress Members were greatly concerned about apportioning the revenues properly between cash payments of the war expenses and borrowed money. We have now reached the point where we must raise all we can by both methods if Congress is to be limited to the sources of revenue laid down by the President. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] when he stated yesterday that the rates of taxation on incomes and profits prescribed in the bill had reached the maximum. We have reached the point where if Congress should cut much deeper into the earnings of business and industry we might destroy the very sources from which we are seeking these great revenues. If Congress would go beyond the sources prescribed, and accepted by the majority, as the proper and only sources of revenue, we could raise a great deal more tax and not seriously interfere with the business of the country. If we would resort to a tariff on imports, a tariff both for protection and revenue, we could produce a great deal in addition to the $8,000,000,000 without disturbing business stability.

There is another source of revenue, which this bill scarcely touches, from which two or three billions of dollars could be realized and business go on unharmed. If we would impose a sales tax, a small sales tax of 1 per cent, on sales of every kind and character, it would produce a prodigious revenue. If the purchaser would pay to the seller, in addition to the purchase price, 1 per cent thereof, as a tax to be returned by the seller, each month or quarter to the collector of internal revenue, the income to the Government would be enormous, and the burden would always be fitted to the ability of the taxpayer to pay. Indeed, every person could in a measure regulate his own taxes. The extravagant and wasteful would pay more, the conservative and careful person less. Everyone could, by the exercise of economy and discretion, so regulate his purchases as to save the amount of his tax, and thus the Government would realize a large amount of revenue from what is now unnecessary waste and thoughtless extravagance. I do not know how much revenue the Government would derive from such a tax.

Last year there passed through the clearing houses $320,000,000,000. No doubt a vast majority of that business represented sales; but the business that goes through the clearing house does not represent by any means nearly all the transactions that are had in the country. Many millions of cash transactions are had in the United States every year. Millions of transactions are had where checks are given that never reach the clearing house but are presented directly to the bank on which they are drawn. Many millions more are cleared through local bankers and these local transactions never appear in the large clearing houses of the great money centers of the United States. So it seems to me that it would be a very conservative estimate to say that by a tax of 1 per cent on all sales the Government would realize $3,000,000,000 every year.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman estimate that there could be as much as $300,000,000,000 sales in a year?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think so; I think more. I think I am conservative in my estimate, but I am free to say I base my estimate largely on clearing-house business. That means only the clearing houses between the banks in large cities. It is true all that does not represent sales, but I have no doubt that a very large per cent of it does, and add to that the sales which are paid by local checks and the cash transactions that are had throughout the country I dare say that $300,000,000,000 of sales underestimates the real facts.

It is not nearly of so much importance as some gentlemen seem to think as to whether we create a large or a small bonded debt. I think a great deal of sympathy has been wasted on the future in connection with this subject.

It is not of much importance to the future generation whether we pay all war expenses as we go along or whether we borrow money and leave some of it for the next generation to pay off. We must be careful, if we really have the interest of the future at heart, not to leave the country bankrupt when we pass it on to the next generation. If in our enthusiasm to relieve the future war debt we exhaust and destroy the business interests of the country, if we use up all of the income and all of the earnings of the country from year to year so there will be nothing to pass on to the future generation, it would be far worse for them and far more detrimental to their interests than it would to leave it as a going business, an actual earning concern, with some debt for them to pay.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I will.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How would it be possible for us to leave the country in that condition unless the money is sent away from home and went away permanently?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If we tax industries more than they can stand, if we take away from the business of the country all of its income, or more, so that they can not operate, so as to leave them prostrate, we will commit an offense against the future far worse than leaving some war debts for it to pay.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How would it be possible for the Government to expend this money unless it went out of the country without going into the hands of the other citizens and other lines of business? In a sense it is being taken away, but it is being left in the country eventually, anyhow.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Well, if it is the gentleman's idea to take away from industries of the country their capital, so they can not do business, and distribute it throughout the country, we would have a prostrate country. We would have no active and important business enterprises to engage capital and employ labor, and the country would be bankrupt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not the gentleman's idea at all. I can not see how, unless all money would leave the country, and if it is still here, how we could become bankrupt.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Here is my idea, if I can make it clear to the gentleman. Suppose we tax the great industries of the country—I do not care what industries they are, the steel industry, the manufacturing industries, if you please, the banking industry—and suppose we cut so deep that we take more than their earnings; suppose we take away from them their capital; suppose we take away so much that they can not make extensions to meet the expanding needs of the country, or suppose we cripple them so they can not go, then they must cease business. The shops and factories will close, the employees will be discharged, and we would pass to the future a hulk instead of a working moving ship.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The bill proposes to raise $8,000,000,000. How much of that is raised by tax on industry?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Well, the gentleman can see from the report just what tax is raised on all different incomes. These incomes come from industries. On the last page of the report the gentleman will find a table that gives the amount of revenue that comes from different sources.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not happen to see it here, and I did not know but that the gentleman had it in his mind.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Another thing about this idea of a tax on sales which seems to me important is this. The ultimate consumer would pay it, of course. He would pay every cent of tax collected in that way, just as he eventually and ultimately will pay the tax that is levied on the incomes of the rich and on war profits. Only under a sales tax he will pay it a little more directly. He will see and know just where and how he pays it. If it increases his cost of living he will know why and how much, and the dishonest salesman could not add more than the tax under false pretenses. If a year ago, when we passed the revenue law, any of us entertained the idea that the income and excess-profits tax would not be passed on to the consumer that delusion has now been dispelled. Do we not know when we pay twice as much for a pair of shoes as we did two or three years ago that we are paying the tax of the manufacturer? When we buy a suit of clothes at a greatly increased price, do we not know that we are paying the income tax of the maker of those clothes? When we pay these greatly increased prices on everything, on necessities and luxuries alike, we are paying the war revenue imposed in the present law, and we will pay that which is imposed in this law. It is better, in my judgment, that the consumer be permitted to pay directly, so that he may know and measure his burden and the sacrifice he is making for the winning of the war.

There was one statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to which I wish to call the attention of the committee.

He said that he had seen it stated that if the Payne-Aldrich law was now in force it would produce between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000, and proceeded to disprove that statement. Now, I think the gentleman must have been mistaken as to what he read. I do not know that anyone pretends that the Payne-Aldrich law, if it was in force now, would produce between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000. But this statement has been made frequently, that if the same average rates on imports were now in force that were in force under the Payne-Aldrich bill, they would produce between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000. And that is easily demonstrated.

The average rate on all imports collected at our ports of entry under that bill was a fraction more than 18 per cent. The average rate collected now on all imports is only 6 per cent. Last year we imported $3,000,000,000 worth of goods on which we imposed a tax, and that produced $180,000,000. This Underwood tariff bill produced $180,000,000 at a 6 per cent average rate on all imports, and at 18 per cent it would produce three times that much, or $540,000,000. So that if the average rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill were now in force we would be receiving at the ports of entry revenues for war purposes to an amount of between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000.

As the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] said, we have become absolutely the free-trade Nation of the world. Last year England collected import duties amounting to $8 per capita for every one of its citizens and we collected $2 per capita. England has again increased her import duties, and during the current year will collect $10.25 per capita, and we will collect $1.68 per capita. If we would impose on imports coming into this country a rate that would produce revenues to the amount of $10.25 for every person in the United States, we would produce $1,127,000,000.

Now, I am insisting that it is of very great importance at the present time that we have a protective tariff. It may not be very effective for the immediate present, while the war is on, but the industries of the country are entitled to know now what their fate is to be when the war closes. They are entitled to know whether their Government will protect them or whether they will be exposed to the ruinous and destructive influences of the Underwood law.

England, France, Italy, all the allied countries, have their eye on the future, and are preparing to raise their rates on imports that they may rehabilitate and build anew their industries after the war closes. The commercial bodies of England and France are passing resolutions and demanding at the hands of their legislatures laws to that end. But there comes to us from the head of this administration a demand that when this war closes all economic barriers shall be swept away. Shall we open our markets to the world when the world is closing her markets to us? We ought to give assurances now to American capital and American labor that they will be given at least an even chance in our own American markets when the protection afforded by war conditions has disappeared at the coming of peace. It is our duty to look ahead. We ought to prepare now for the great readjustment.

The people ought to realize that policies are being reversed, that European countries are adopting protection, and America is adopting free trade. For 50 years we enjoyed the blessings of a Republican protective tariff. The country grew rich and prospered. We vastly raised the standard of American living. The people were better fed, better clothed, better sheltered, and better educated than those of European countries. We have produced an army of the strongest, bravest men the world has ever known. It pays a nation to protect its citizens in time of peace. They will protect it in time of war.

I submit, when we have changed policies, when Europe has adopted protection for European capital and European labor, and we have adopted the policy of free trade—when these policies are reversed, then conditions will be reversed, and the American standard of living will be reduced and the European standard will be exalted. I do not believe the American people will close their eyes to the fact that this administration is leading us in that direction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I desire to call attention to another thing: There has been much said on the floor at this session and at the last session about certain sections of the country paying an undue proportion of these taxes. New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois pay more than one-half and 10 States pay four-fifths of the revenue produced from incomes and excess profits. That is an interesting economic fact, but it is not an argument for nor against the legislation. Taxes must be levied on wealth, not on persons. They must be imposed according to property, not according to area. Much of the wealth of the country centers in the great cities around and in which great manufacturing and commercial enterprises have gathered. Large income and excess-profits taxes will never be derived from agricultural sections. We need not expect it. Profits from agriculture are not great. The farmer is a producer of raw material, and he who produces raw material never becomes extremely rich. The nation that confines itself to the production of raw material is always a poor nation. The great profits are made in manufacture and trade, and in those centers these taxes must be had in the first instance. New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois should not regret, but should rejoice in the fact that they possess the great wealth from which the revenue is derived. Their burden is no greater to them than the burden of Iowa, Alabama, and Texas is to them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman take issue with the President of the United States in that statement, considering the message the President delivered in this House on May 24, when he indicated that the present laws were susceptible of injustice and inequality, that they were marred by these inequalities, which should be remedied?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Well, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania construes the message of the President to mean that it was an inequality because New York and Pennsylvania and Illinois paid more tax than other States, he wholly misconstrues the meaning of the President's message.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I construed the meaning of the President's message to be that the taxes should be equitably distributed throughout the country. I would like to read that portion of the President's message. It will take but a minutes—that portion with which the gentleman from Illinois takes issue. Referring to the people generally, the President said:

> They know that the war must be paid for, and that it is they who must pay for it; and if the burden is justly distributed and the sacrifice made a common sacrifice from which none escapes who can bear it at all, they will carry it cheerfully and with a sort of solemn pride.

Now, in the address that I made day before yesterday, to which the gentleman from Illinois took exception, I used certain statistics which had been prepared by the Treasury Department, in which it appeared that a very large proportion of the people of the United States were paying no taxes at all.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I agree exactly with what the President said, and I have no doubt but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania agrees with him also. The President suggested that the legislation be such that it would distribute these burdens equitably. The gentleman is making this mistake: He thinks it would be equitable for the man who is earning $1,000 or $2,000 to be required to pay the same amount of revenue as the man pays who is earning $10,000 or $15,000. That is evidently his idea of equity. He thinks the poor man should pay the same as the rich man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; if——

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Let me finish. Or is it his idea that Alabama, which has no great business enterprises and which is largely an agricultural State and has not nearly as much wealth as some of these Northern States—is it his idea that it would be equitable to make Alabama pay the same amount as Illinois? Is that the gentleman's notion of equity?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. If the conditions do not compare, then the reasoning of the gentleman would not apply. If Alabama, for example, has a shipyard and contractors are building ships and paying high wages, and the same condition prevails in Pennsylvania, and those who make the profits are taxed, then I say the taxes should be levied in equal proportions upon those that are making profits in Alabama as upon those who are making the profits in Pennsylvania. That is the general trend of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I would state for the gentleman's information that is what the present law does, and it is what this bill does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am inclined to think, from the statistics I read day before yesterday, that that very thing has not been done heretofore. I said during the discussion that I questioned whether this bill covered that situation, seeing how our revenue laws are enforced at the present time.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Of course, you can not expect a State or a locality that has not great wealth to pay great revenues. Now, the reason New York and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania and Illinois are rich is because they have been engaged in the kind of business in which men get rich. Men engaged in commerce, in manufacture, in transportation are the men who have grown rich in this Republic. It is because there are greater profits in business of that kind than there are in agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes additional.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. There are greater profits in enterprises of that kind than there are in agriculture. That is why these localities have grown strong and wealthy, because the people there are engaged in other pursuits than agriculture. The occupation that pays the least profit is the occupation of the farmer. It is the manufacturing nations, the commercial nations, in which men grow immensely wealthy, and not on the farms. That is why New York and Pennsylvania and Illinois pay more than these agricultural States.

And let me call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to this fact: I lay down to him this plain proposition, that the American farmer pays more of this revenue, according to his means, than do the rich men of the country. It is true that not a very great per cent of the farmers make tax returns, but they are paying very much of the income tax that is assessed against these gentlemen in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Chicago. None of the income tax that the farmer himself pays is passed on to the consumer. He can not do that. He does not fix the prices which he receives for his products. The man who buys of the farmer fixes the price, and the farmer can not pass his income tax on to the next man. But when this farmer buys shoes and pays three prices for them, or when he buys plows at two prices, or when he buys harness at two or three prices, or when he buys twine at four prices, or when he buys anything that he needs, he is paying the income tax of the manufacturer, the income tax of the man in commerce, the income tax of the man who transports the goods to the farmer. The farmer sells at the buyer's price and he buys at the seller's price. He can not add his tax to the price at which he sells, but the man who sells to him can and does add his tax, and the farmer pays it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I submit that these increased prices that he pays for the things he buys occasionaly are compensated fully and completely by what the consumer pays in higher prices for the farm products that he must have every day of the year.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Well, the gentleman is wrong again.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not. The needs of the consumer require a daily expenditure for foodstuffs at the highest price that the world has ever known.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It is true that the farmer is getting more to-day for his grain and his pork and his beef than he ever did before, or more than he did during peace times, and if he did not get more he would not be producing these things. You have got to pay him more under the circumstances to keep him going. He could not pay these high prices for things with which he operates his farm. He could not pay these high prices for hired help, if he did not get more. And yet he does not get the price that the gentleman pays in Philadelphia for the butter and eggs and other things that he has on his table. The profiteer, the middleman in Philadelphia gets much more than half of the difference between the cost of production and what the gentleman from Pennsylvania pays to put the food on his table.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman and I come together again, because there is no real difference between the producer and the consumer except that the consumer pays the highest possible price and the farmer gets his price, a price which he thinks is not commensurate with the service that he gives to the consumer.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It is very evident, I think, to all who heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania speak the other day that he is not much of a farmer himself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that when the farmer sells his product he sells it in a market where the price is fixed by somebody else?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And when he buys his machinery and other implements, and whatever he needs, the prices of those things are fixed by somebody else?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; that has always been the history of farm life.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So he gets it going and coming.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan, I wish to suggest that the farmer buys his tools once in five years, possibly. He buys his shoes once in six months, whereas we have to buy the products of the farm every day of our lives. We use eggs constantly, and we buy them at the highest price.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Is the gentleman complaining because the middle man can hold up the farmer only once in five years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No, I am anxious that they shall both have fair play, but my point is that we must buy of the farmer continuously.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am just coming to that, and I want the gentleman to listen to a few facts that will help him greatly. They will help to dispel some delusions from which some city people are suffering.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman would base his test on the ownership of automobiles. I should like to ask him if it is not true at the present time that his own constituents have more automobiles per population than my constituency in the city of Philadelphia have?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I do know about that. Many of the farmers in my district have automobiles, for which they paid large profits to the manufacturers, including the manufacturers' excess-profit tax.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do know; and I know that the gentleman's constituency is far better off than mine in that regard.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. But the gentleman ought not to begrudge the farmer an automobile ride now and then. He can only use it on Sunday or after nightfall. He works 12 or 14 hours a day. It seems to chafe the gentleman if he sees a farmer driving out with his family in the evening for a little recreation after 10 or 12 hours' hard work in the harvest field.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I like to see it; but I will match the gentleman's farmer constituent, riding around with his family in his automobile, with my workman constituent leading his children out by the hand and walking along the sidewalk.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman's workman constituent?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; the workmen whom I represent, whose labor I will compare with that of the gentleman's farmer constituents.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman's workmen constituents—does he refer to those at Hog Island, some of whom get as little as $10 a day for an eight-hour day? [Laughter.] The farmers in the United States work 12 and 14 hours a day, and the average family of four, working together, earns a dollar a day and nothing for overtime. The farmers in my district, however, do better than that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He has to go back and forth in a crowded trolley car or walk. May I say to the gentleman that a great deal has been said about the high wages at Hog Island? They prevail, if they are high, in every shipyard at the present time under Government auspices and Government direction. I happen to have a list of the wages paid, handed to me by the Shipping Board, and I find the lowest rate of wages is 40 cents an hour and the highest $1.35, and eight hours prevail. So it seems untrue that these men are obtaining $10 per day or $20 per day—the wages that have been spoken of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much do they get for extra time? I understand they get as high as $30 or $40 a day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They may get something for extra time; but it was admitted on the floor yesterday that the farmers, who are supposed to be badly treated, are doing so well to-day that they can afford to pay $100 per month for a laborer in the field and give him board besides. I think our men would be glad to obtain that job.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been very kind to the gentleman and allowed him to make several speeches in my time, and I must proceed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will remember that I yielded two or three times to the gentleman when I had the floor.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am not here to champion the cause of the farmer. I say emphatically that I represent the best agricultural district in the United States. In my district they produce year after year more agricultural products than in any other district in this great country. [Applause.] I state that as a challenge; I am not bragging.

I will say, further, that I believe they have done it for the last 20 consecutive years. I am not here to champion his cause. I never thought the farmer was entitled to that distinctive appellation of "the honest farmer." He is not any more honest than anybody else, but he is just as honest. He is no more honest than the merchant or the banker, or the lawyer, or the wage earner, but he is just as honest.

When we make the mistake of picking out whole classes of men and denounce them as slackers or as cheaters or as being dishonest we make a grave mistake, and we ought not to do it. If we are going to classify men according to their merits we ought to go among all the occupations and all the professions, pick out the good men and the bad men, and classify them according to their merits. We ought not say that the farmers of America are slackers or that the farmers of America are shirkers; it is not fair to say that the lawyers are dishonest as a class; it is not fair to say that the merchants as a class cheat their customers. The man that undertakes to characterize any occupation, or any class of American citizens, as being more disreputable, or more reputable, than any other class simply does not understand human nature and does not know how to estimate the merits of men. He speaks from prejudice.

I was born and grew up on a farm. I have associated and dealt with farmers all my life. I know something of their joys and sorrows, something of their hopes and aspirations. When I hear reflections cast upon them as a class I resent it. When the statement is made on this floor, either directly or by inuendo, that farmers do not make their tax returns as honestly and faithfully as any other class I challenge the statement. I know they do not deserve to be picked out and charged with shortcomings that do not belong to all other occupations. If we Members who represent farming communities do not speak for them when they are assailed nobody else will. They do not keep special representatives in the lobbies of the legislative halls to speak for them.

I am going to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania a few facts. You know the average size of the American farm is 138 acres, and only half of this is improved. The average amount of improved land in the farms of the United States is 75 acres. That is a great deal less than many of you thought. But the average improved acreage of the American farm, as I say, is 75 acres. The averge size of the farmer's family is 4.6 grown persons. Now, remember, I say grown persons. The average number of grown persons of the American farm family is 4.6, and I am not saying anything about the babies and school children. This average farm family of 4.6 on this farm averaging 75 acres make gross every year an average of $1,236. It takes $532 to operate the farm, leaving a net income to the farmer, after he has paid his operating expenses, of $724.

But he is entitled to a little allowance for income on his investment. Do you know at 5 per cent the average income of the American farmer on his investment is only $322? So you take away from $724 5 per cent for the return on his investment and you leave him the magnificent sum of $402 as the net income of the average American farm family consisting of 4.6 persons. So you see the average American farm family, consisting of father, mother, and at least two grown children, and sometimes more, all together, for everybody works on the farm, including father, receive for their year's labor the average sum of $402, or about $1.35 per day for the four of them, and they work 12 and 14 hours a day in the busy season. The tax law in force at the time the statistics from which the gentleman quoted on yesterday were made up gave to every married man an exemption of $4,000. Nearly every man operating a farm is married. Considering the average net income of the farmer to be $402, it is not strange that only a small per cent of them pay an income tax. Yet the gentleman complains that only 14,000 of them out of 6,000,000 made tax returns under that law. I will agree with the gentleman. When one reads in the statistics that only 14,000 American farmers out of 6,000,000 made tax returns, that one must come to one of two conclusions—either that the American farmer is a slacker and has not made honest returns to the tax collector or that he has a very meager income. The trouble with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is that he drew the wrong conclusion, because he did not know the facts. My advice is that he should not come to any conclusion until he has ascertained the facts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman ought not to make that statement, and I ask that he permit me to say in his time, because this is going in the RECORD, that that statement is not justified either by the belief or the feeling of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or from anything he said.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I do not want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to think that I have made the statement with any ill feeling toward him. I have done it to give him light on a subject on which he needed light.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No one in this House, nor in the country, has a higher regard for the American farmer than I, notwithstanding all of the jesting that may have been done upon this floor. I believe thoroughly in our interdependence as between the farm and the city, but I was pointing out from certain statistics furnished by the Revenue Office that it happened in this country that only 14,000 out of 6,000,000 farmers reported income taxes, and that the percentage of reports was equally small with regard to the merchant class of the country and with regard to 20 other occupations which the Treasury itself selected.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the statement just made has revised the statement made yesterday, I will modify my statement. I shall modify it in this way, and say that the gentleman made the statement not knowing the truth about the condition of the American farmer. Is that satisfactory?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will permit me to say in his time still, I hope, that I said during the discussion that I was seeking information; that the Internal Revenue Office facts were so startling and strange as to be susceptible of explanation. The gentleman from Illinois is giving his explanation and I am listening attentively.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am sure the gentleman will not make the mistake again. I have given him the facts from the very best authority, on the things I have stated, that there is in the United States. He knows the truth about it now, and I undertake to say that in his opinion it is a wonder as many American farmers did make tax returns as actually did.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And yet the gentleman, being on the committee and having heard the testimony of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Roper, will recall that he said he wanted $7,500,000 for twenty-five hundred additional employees to go out among the farmers and others to secure the returns he had not yet been able to obtain.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue did not have the same idea that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He coincided with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman should not interrupt me until I complete my answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He coincided with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. But for a different purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois without his permission.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania very cheerfully voted for that increased revenue so that the Internal Revenue Commissioner could investigate the farmers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not necessarily farmers.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. But the internal-revenue collector wanted the money, not to investigate the farmers, but to investigate the profiteers in Philadelphia.

Mr. Chairman, the statement which I have here is taken from a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture the 15th day of February, 1916, and was made by W. J. Stillman, Chief of the Office of Farm Management of the Department of Agriculture. He says in this statement that it is based on investigations made by that bureau and on the reports made by the Census Bureau. They found that their independent investigations and the report made by the Census Bureau correspond, and both of these sources of information bear out the information which I have given here, and I ask leave to print this at this point in my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following is a verbatim statement, taken from the evidence of Mr. W. J. Spillman, Chief of the Office of Farm Management in the Department of Agriculture, at a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture, February 15, 1916:

"Perhaps the central idea in the Office of Farm Management is to find out how much money the farmers are making, how they make it, and why they make it. We have been able, by using census data and factors worked out in our research work, to determine the following facts:

"The average farmer in the United States produces crops to the value of $511, exclusive of crops fed to live stock.

"The value of the live-stock products on the average farm is $177.

"The value of animals sold and slaughtered is $288.

"The value of the house rent, food, and fuel consumed by the family and not reported by the census is $260.

"The gross earnings of the farm and farm family—that is, of the capital and labor—is $1,236. The expenses total $512, made up of maintenance charges, and miscellaneous items amounting to $430, making the net earnings of the farm and farm family $724. Estimating that the property should earn 5 per cent, the property earnings are $322, and deducting that from the earnings of the average farm and farm family—$402—including what the farm furnishes toward the family living.

"The CHAIRMAN. The family, I believe, consists of five members, does it not?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. It is the equivalent of about 4.6 grown people—that is, the equivalent of about 4.6 grown people—having an income for their labor, including what they get from the farm in the way of vegetables, milk, and things of that character, of $402. In addition to that, they get $322, which represents the interest on their investment, out of which a considerable number of them who have mortgages must pay the interest on their mortgage.

"The CHAIRMAN. Let us see if we get what you mean. Your figures, then, show that the net earning capacity of the average farm family in the United States is how much?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. $402.

"The CHAIRMAN. $402?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes.

"Mr. CANDLER. And the farm family consists of 4.6 grown people?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. The equivalent of 4.6 grown people.

"Mr. CANDLER. That is an average of $100 for each one, then?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. Just about.

"Mr. RUBEY. You have just used the term 'net earning capacity.' That might indicate that they did not do any better than that.

"Mr. SPILLMAN. I did not mean, Mr. RUBEY, that that was their earning capacity.

"Mr. RUBEY. You mean that that is what they have done?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes, sir; that is what they have earned.

"Mr. HOWELL. And you have deducted from that their living expenses?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. No; that is included in that $402.

"Mr. HOWELL. You have charged them up in this with all they have consumed off the farm?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes; that is counted as part of the salary and included in that $402.

"Mr. HAWLEY. Have you taken it for granted that every farm furnishes the family with wood?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes; and with vegetables and milk and things of that kind. That is all included in this $402, and that is the wages that they get.

"Mr. HAWLEY. Does every farm furnish the family with wood?

"Mr. SPILLMAN. Not every farm, but a good many farms furnish a great deal more. We have a bulletin, which I will take up a little later, in which it is shown that the amount of food, fuel, and house rent furnished by the farm is $421.

"Mr. REILLY. Then the average farmer does not make anything?
"Mr. SPILLMAN. The average farmer, for his wages——
"Mr. REILLY. Gets nothing.
"The CHAIRMAN. Less than nothing.
"Mr. SPILLMAN. No; he gets a good deal to eat and a house to live in.
"Mr. REILLY. I mean he gets nothing above his living?
"Mr. SPILLMAN. He does not get quite that. His living is $420, and he gets $402.
"Mr. REILLY. I do not know where you get these statistics, but in my section of the country they would not hold true.
"Mr. SPILLMAN. There are many sections where they would not hold true.
"Mr. LESHER. Have you given out that information to the public? If you have, I do not believe you will induce many people to go back to the farm.
"Mr. SPILLMAN. We do not want to induce people to go back to the farm. We believe it is a mistaken idea to induce city people to go back to the farm—people who have more to learn than would the farmer who goes to the city to be a lawyer or a banker. This idea of getting city people to go out on the farm, from the viewpoint of the Office of Farm Management, is a serious error.
"The CHAIRMAN. You are promoting the stay-on-the-farm movement?
"Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes, sir; the stay-on-the-farm movement, and not the back-to-the-farm movement. I have the facts here. It is true that there are a great many people who do not believe these facts, but they are facts, nevertheless.
"The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you a few questions in that connection. This is a little against our rule, which is that the gentleman be allowed to complete his statement before asking questions, but this is so very interesting. How do your figures compare with the figures of the Census Bureau?
"Mr. SPILLMAN. They are mostly Census Bureau figures. Most of the figures here are taken from the Census Bureau.
"The CHAIRMAN. In your investigations in the field, have those investigations verified to a large extent the accuracy of the census figures?
"Mr. SPILLMAN. Yes, sir; to a very large extent. I have an instance right here in which I can show you how nearly they verify the census statistices. This is a farm-management pamphlet for Chester County, Pa., which I took the liberty of sending to each of you gentlemen some two weeks ago, because it shows particularly the most important type of work we are doing. I knew you had to consider this work, and I thought you would appreciate it."

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the exclusive possessor of another delusion. [Laughter.] I want to refer to that, too. The gentleman has had for 20 years the idea that we ought to tax cotton. I do not know whether he is aiming this blow at the cotton grower of the South or the cotton wearer of the North. Wherever it is aimed, we know where it will fall. It will fall on those who wear cotton. The consumer will pay it all in the long run, whether it be the workmen in the district represented by the gentleman himself or whether it be the farmer in my district. Why, cotton is as essential in clothing as wheat is in foodstuffs. Tobacco is the only agricultural product that is taxed and cotton does not belong to that class. He told you the other day how I would go out among the farmers in my district and tell what a splendid fight I made for the honest farmer. I will certainly not conceal from them anything I have done. He will never tell the downtrodden mechanics at Hog Island how he tried to raise the price of their cotton shirts and their overalls. [Applause.] Will he tell them in the coming campaign that he urged a tax on cotton so as to increase the price to those poor fellows who are getting only $1.35 an hour and $2.70 for overtime of the cotton they wear. But I can see him now—although the campaign is far off—I can see him appealing to these voters, telling them how he went forth single handed and assailed this great octopus, the American farmer, and made him divulge to the tax collector these stupendous and magnificent incomes of $402 per year for a family of 4.6 persons. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to indulge in any language that will get me into a controversy with any of my colleagues to-day. I have made no preparation whatever to speak on this bill, but I think I ought to say a few words expressing my opinion of the responsibility of Americans in connection with the taxation and purchase of bonds to enable the country successfully to conduct the war. I doubt if I would even have said a word except for the fact I am not to be here when the bill comes up for a vote, and I want those who are here to understand that I am heartily in favor of doing all that can be done to aid in the accomplishment of the great task upon which we have entered. [Applause.] My understanding is we are obligated to expend about $24,000,000,000 during the fiscal year 1919; that one-third of that amount is to be levied in taxation upon the American people, and this sum is provided for in the pending bill. It is a gigantic sum, one that the mind can not conceive of; and yet we are engaged in a gigantic enterprise. We are engaged in an enterprise such as no people ever entered upon before. Every home in America will have given its sons before the contest is over. Some will survive and others perish. All should feel the need to make every sacrifice. Some can go to the front, others must remain behind. Men are making the supreme sacrifice, buckling on their armor, going forth where battle rages, offering for the life of the country the lifeblood of their hearts; and we who are unable to do this should not complain, no matter how burdensome the taxation may be. Every dollar, every man, should be contributed to the success of the war. We can not compromise with this question. We must fight the war to a successful conclusion. It must not be a around-table settlement; it must be victory on the battle field. We might possibly compromise with those who are living, but under no circumstances must we ever think of compromising away the honor of those who have laid down their lives on the battle field in defense of America's honor; and the more of our men who die there the greater our obligation will be to fight on, and fight on to victory, and the more enthusiastic will the American people become in their insistence upon a successful warfare against Germany, the more readily will they permit the imposition of the burdens of taxation upon them, even to the last dollar.

And so in giving expression to the few words that I have to say here to-day, I want it to be understood that never before, as I see it, has America been so unified as it is to-day. There is no division as to what we ought to do. There may have been at the beginning of the war, but that no longer exists. Everybody now who is anybody, and living under the American flag, is in favor of doing the last thing that must be done, no matter what sacrifice it takes, to win victory for America and for the world.

We ought to be proud that we speak for a united people, with a fixed determination to preserve this as the land of freedom, to insist that no matter what may be necessary to be done, we shall do it in order that the institutions under which we live may be perpetuated and handed down to a grateful posterity.

Great as the sum is, beyond the conception of the mind of man, America will meet it. It will meet it cheerfully. The American people will smile while they pay. Some inequalities will appear in the bill. Taxation never can be uniform. It will fall unequally somewhere. Contentions are made here and there throughout the country that certain lines of endeavor are being unjustly imposed upon, but all of these contenders will admit that they are willing to pay their share, that they will pay it without complaint, and that they want to be understood as being patriotic. They do not want anyone to get the notion that they are finding fault even though they may be doing this.

I wish we could find some means for levying taxes so that they would fall equally everywhere, so that the burden would be felt alike by everyone; but it does not make any difference how honest you may be in an effort to raise either this vast sum or any other sum, you never succeed in meeting the expectations of everybody. That can not be done, and when you have done the best that it is possible to do with the light before you, that human agency is able to do, you have the right to say that you have met the reasonable expectations of the American people; and if there are those among them who will complain after that, let them complain. No man will be called upon to pay taxes who has no income. Many people will find themselves without incomes, but that is not the fault of the tax-levying body. They will find themselves without income because the line of business in which they are engaged is not essential to the war; and it will go out of existence. It can not be converted into a war activity. And many people will fail. They will lose all they have. They are not all profiteers. They can not be. And I hope that when this bill is finally enacted, although we have thus far not been able to criminally prosecute the profiteers, it will have provisions in it that will take all their profiteering income away and put it back into the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. HELVERING. Just along the line of the gentleman's argument, does he not think that this spirit has been exemplified from the fact that during the seven or eight weeks the committee was considering this bill there was no class that complained of the rates or the amounts they have to pay?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the people of America have reached that point where they really understand we are in the war. They were slow to realize it at first. They were slow to rise in anger. But they have now fully realized that we are in the war. Their boys are on the other side. Many of them are buried there, and many others of them will return home crippled, as many have done already. It does not make any difference what their nationality may be, as I see it, for every nationality has come to realize that this is, above all nations of the world, the land of opportunity. Look at the names of the men who have died or have been wounded on the battle field. People say that the Germans are unfriendly to America—that is, the Germans who live in America—but we see as many German names among the dead and wounded as we see of those of any other nationality. And the German women over in my section of the country have organized associations to knit and sew and provide for the soldiers across the sea. They are loyal. They may not have wanted war against the fatherland. Who can blame them for that? But since the war has come they are loyal to America, and they will stand beside the Americans as well as the Americans themselves stand beside each other. I am proud to see the unanimity that prevails all over the land. I am proud to see the determination on the part of the American people to win the war, to sustain the Commander in Chief in every effort that he may make. I am proud that all have expressed the willingness to bear their burden, to pay their share, to give their lives and their limbs, to spill their blood, if need be, that America may live under the freedom which has prevailed here from its foundation.

I am for the bill in its present form or any other form that may be needed to raise the money. We will all pay our share. We may feel it. It will compel us to economize. But it will make us better men. We will be compelled to do things ourselves that we formerly employed others to do. We will learn a lesson in good citizenship. We will come down from the higher level in the clouds to the level of the man on the street. We will realize that we are only made of common clay, no matter how good clothes we wear or how much money we have. The son of the millionaire and the son of the poorest man in the land will sleep in the same cot, will shoot side by side at the foe of America, and die on the same battle field. They will experience a comradeship that they never knew before.

Better things will happen at the end of the war. We will have a rejuvenation of the citizenship of America that will make for the good of the future. We will then see what we have never dreamed of seeing before, namely, the men who have gone to fight America's battles come back home to run America. And they will be entitled to run it. They fought to save it. Some of them died that we might live in peace and happiness and freedom. But those who survive will be at the council table shaping the future policies of America when they come back to us. [Applause.] They will make for conservatism. They will make for better government. They will make for cleaner things. They will make for a more harmonious people, and they will make for less distinction between wealth and labor and race and creed.

I believe the future of America is bright as the result of this war, although we hate the war. All that we have, all that we love and are able to fight, are in the war. I would be glad to be beside mine over there if I were young enough to fight and able to do so. That would be the first thing I would do. But since I can not do that, I can by my voice, and my work, and my vote, and my pay, to the extent of my ability, do my share, and that I will do with the greatest pleasure in all the world, for I love America. [Applause.] I love her institutions, and I want to see her maintain the freedom that has been the admiration of all the world. I want to see the Army and Navy of America stand foremost of all the armies and navies of the world. We have done wonderful work since the war began. And we will achieve greater accomplishments as the days go by. We are proud of them, but we will be still prouder, and America everywhere, from coast to coast, and lakes to gulf, will be able to continue to sing the praises of the American Army and the American Navy as victory is accomplished upon the battle fields of France and on the high seas, and the world is free to maintain that independence for which we fight. [Applause.]

We owe allegiance to the flag. We owe it to the country. We are for America; and because we are for America, regardless of what our political affiliations may be, we are for the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy, no matter what his politics may be. We are for him, because he leads our forces. We want him to lead them victoriously. We are proud of the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy, and we pledge our support to him now and until the end of the war, in order that we may bring victory to the American arms and honor to the American flag. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SHALLENBERGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONERGAN). The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the consideration by the House of Representatives of the revenue bill of 1918 marks an era in the legislation of the world. Never before since the beginning of organized government has any lawmaking body been called upon to enact a measure providing for the levy of taxes of the magnitude provided for in the present bill. The Constitution wisely provides that the initiation of revenue legislation shall rest with the direct representatives of the people, and in agreement with the responsibility that the Constitution imposes, the world witnesses the splendid spectacle of the people of the United States voluntarily and cheerfully, through their chosen agents, imposing upon themselves an annual tax burden of $8,000,000,000.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House and its distinguished chairman merit and will receive the gratitude of Congress and the country for their arduous and diligent labors in preparing the bill now before us. Confronted by the necessity of drafting a measure raising such a stupendous sum, and likewise conscious of an obligation to so lay the taxes to be levied as not to disrupt the business and industrial activities nor cripple the productive agencies of the country, the committee has discharged its task with ability and impartiality.

In the face of Treasury estimates that the national expenditures for 1919 will total $24,000,000,000, the committee and the Congress have wisely concluded that it is the duty of the present generation to pay as large a proportion of the expenses of the war as may be possible. With one-third of such expenditures discharged by taxation, two-thirds may be safely met by the issuance and sale of Government bonds. The increase in tax levies is principally laid upon excess and war profits and incomes. Those whose profits have been largely increased by reason of a state of war will justly be required to pay the Public Treasury 80 per cent of such profits and earnings. Taxation of incomes, war profits, and excess profits will place the burden upon those most able to bear it—upon those best able to make the sacrifice. This system is a "selective-draft" plan of taxation. It is that plan best calculated not only to meet the immediate burdens of taxation but to anticipate the economic problems with which the United States will be confronted when peace shall come again. The history of wars discloses that in the past huge fortunes have been amassed by reason thereof. The extraordinary and sudden demand for war supplies greatly enhances prices. This enhancement of price, as well as the multiplied production, rapidly enriches war industries. The committee and the Congress have wisely determined that in America the profiteer shall not fatten at public expense but that war and excess profits shall be paid into the Federal Treasury. It is not only a just and equitable policy but one founded upon a wise economic basis.

The justice of income taxation has been recognized by the American public for many years; its wisdom has been sanctioned by an amendment to the Constitution, and more and more has public attention been directed to this source of revenue. It is but fair that both individuals and corporations receiving incomes above the exemption provided should contribute a liberal share to the Public Treasury. If the young manhood of the land gladly rushes to arms in the Nation's hour of need, ready to make any sacrifice, surely there should be no grumbling when extravagant profits are drafted for the service of country.

The necessities of the times in which we live have compelled resort to many sources and objects of taxation that in times of peace and under normal conditions have been immune from the Federal tax gatherer. The bill is the composite result of somewhat divergent views of those of differing political faith. In each and all of its various provisions the bill does not, perhaps, reflect the exact ideas of any individual Member of this House, but in its entirety, in its whole scope, it is a measure upon which Democrats and Republicans alike may forget their partisan differences and give to it hearty and harmonious support. [Applause.] We are not living in normal times; this is the time neither for partisan platitudes nor political preachment. We can not hesitate or quibble over minor differences as to taxation or tariff when billions of dollars are imperatively required to prosecute America's participation in the mightiest struggle that ever stained the soil of Europe or snatched from the brow of conquered kings the despot's crown.

I shall vote for the bill and this House will vote for it as a measure necessary to promote the giant enterprise in which our country has embarked.

There was a time when the policy of the entrance of the United States into the conflict could with propriety be discussed, but that time passed away when the German Government, breaking its solemn assurances, announced that ruthless submarine warfare upon American shipping, upon American citizens, and upon American women and children would be resumed on February 1, 1917. There was a time when America still hesitated to plunge into the miseries and agonies of war, when she viewed with horror the tragic consequences that would surely follow such a step, but that time came to an end when Germany filled our land with spies and conspirators and armed them with bomb and torch with which to wreck and destroy munition plants and factories and the lives of employees engaged therein. [Applause.] There was a time when America reluctantly contemplated appeal to the sword, but that time was terminated when Germany sought to incite the Mexican Republic, in whose behalf the United States had unselfishly and in a spirit of international friendship contributed so much toward pacifying its turbulent factions and substituting tranquillity for anarchy, to make war upon us under the fatuous lure and inducement of the dismemberment of the Union and the delivery to Mexico of the fairest and most promising States of the Republic. When repeated outrageous violations of international law, continual insults to our national honor, and treacherous betrayals of solemn assurances could no longer be tolerated by a brave and self-respecting people, the Nation, under the leadership of its great President, Woodrow Wilson, turned in righteous wrath, and, hurling at the enemy a defiant challenge to her self-assumed dictatorship of the civilized world, began to prepare to defend upon the field of battle what she had been unable to successfully maintain through the channels of diplomacy and peace. America, with grim determination, resolved that to the high purpose of vindicating our national rights, of disputing the desire of an impudent Emperor to substitute for the well-established canons of international law his own will, of preventing the conquest and dismemberment of weaker nations and the political slavery of their people by a despotic military power knowing no law save force and no rule of conduct save cruel and criminal aggression, she should pledge all her might and men and money, and, setting her heart with inflexible resolution, should give all that is hers, save liberty, to secure the triumph of her cause. [Applause.]

Let us for a moment pause to examine the basic causes that underlie the immediate provocations which involved America in the war.

Since the days of Frederick the Great, Prussia, and since the days of Bismarck, the German Empire, have been obsessed with the idea that destiny has ordained that Germany, under the leadership of Prussia, shall dominate the world and by the prowess of her sword impose upon all peoples German kultur and German institutions. Since the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, systematically and unhaltingly Germany has sharpened her sword, has armed and drilled her sons, has educated the youth in the belief in and practice of war, has filled her schools and universities with the philosophy that might makes right, that German blood is superior to all other, that the German race is predestined to master mankind, and has filled her arsenals and storerooms with ordnance and supplies and all the equipment and panoply of war, awaiting an opportune and propitious pretext to turn her engines of destruction upon her unprepared neighbors.

Such doctrines and schemes could only find lodgment and fruitage in an autocratic political system such as that of the Hohenzollerns—they could never find congenial soil in a Republic like our own, where the ideals of the people find expression in and give form to public affairs and where the Government is directed and controlled by the people rather than the lives and fortunes of the people being ordered and directed by a sovereign. And here at last lies the point of difference that, even though the United States might have been able, by the sacrifice of national honor, to avert the immediate issues that impelled her with drawn sword to step into the theater of war, sooner or later would inevitably have brought America, the great champion of free institutions, into armed conflict with the empires that still desperately cling to the fetich of absolutism and the divine right of kings.

Here is a parallel that is presented to the twentieth century—upon one side or the other must be ranged the peoples of the earth—this day—the day of our struggle with the enemy:

America is ruled by the people; Germany by the Kaiser; the one's institutions are those of a democracy; the other's, the apotheosis of a hereditary autocracy. America bows in reverence before the Deity and in humility beseeches His blessings and approval; Germany counts God as the "good old German god," and the Emperor with blasphemy on his lips claims partnership with God while directing his submarines to torpedo hospital ships and his aviators to bomb hospitals filled with helpless wounded soldiers and marked with the sign of the Red Cross. Our enemy is devoted to militarism; our own country is warmly attached to peace and its triumphs—the one hungering for conquest and imperial sway, the other covetous of none of her neighbor's land, but championing the cause of the wronged against the aggressor.

Two such systems, the one seeking to crush the liberties of the world, and the other, the foremost example of what a great people may accomplish under institutions of their own making, quickening in the hearts of the peoples of all nations aspirations for liberty and equality, could not and can not both long endure, side by side, in peace.

This is forcibly illustrated by a conversation which Mr. Gerard, the American ambassador at Berlin, had with the Emperor on October 22, 1915, in which the Emperor said: "America had better look out after this war," and "I shall stand no nonsense from America after this war." Thus spoke an insolent monarch to the representative of a great free people. Thus spoke a self-appointed arbiter—a censor of the conduct of sovereign peoples and nations—thus spoke a pretentious potentate who derived his right to rule by favored birth, to the representative of a mighty people who derived their right to rule themselves from bloody sacrifices upon the fields of battle of the American Revolution, and have preserved it through the years by sleepless vigilance and shall preserve it against the armies of this haughty Hohenzollern by their fortunes and the heroic blood of their hardy sons.

Though the central powers comprise Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey, the former dominates all the rest so completely that the armies and resources of all are at the disposal of the war lords of Germany. So abjectly have Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey subordinated the interests of their people and governments to those of their powerful ally that those kingdoms have become merely the instruments of German will. They are but the physical members of a political and military alliance, whose mind and will reside at Berlin. Vienna and Sofia and Constantinople may attempt to flatter themselves into the belief that they are still the capitals of kings, but each of them "knows his master's voice," and that voice is at Berlin. Each has sunk to the level of a dependency in an economic, political, and military sense. Lured to enter such an alliance by promises of territory and prestige, they so linked their fortunes and future with Germany that they can not be disengaged without incurring disaster. By the force of circumstances, which they can no longer control, they are being hastened to their doom. In the hope of attaining her plans for the establishment of "Mittel Europa" and her own primacy therein and the extension of her influence through Asia to the Persian Gulf, Germany saw that the subserviency of Turkey was necessary, and without scruple joined common cause with a nation whose record of outrage and butchery has stained European history for more than four centuries. In greedy Bulgaria dangling German promises of new frontiers appealed to an appetite that had hungered since the Balkan War. That Germany was able to secure the assistance of Bulgaria and Turkey by tempting offers to share the loot is cumulative evidence that her primary purpose in waging war was and is to forcibly annex to her territory all that she may be able to subjugate by arms.

Had the Kaiser and his allies vanquished the allies and left them stricken and despoiled, he would have attempted to lead his triumphant armies against our own soil, here to gorge his appetite with the spoils of our cities and to wring from America staggering indemnities. The conflict lay in our pathway; it could not be averted without the surrender of all that we hold most dear.

Germany initiated the war with the same defiant disregard of the rights of neutral nations as signalized her later conduct toward the United States. Coincidentally with the declaration of war, in a bold and rapid stroke at the French capital, she poured her legions into Luxemburg and Belgium, both of whose independence and neutrality she had solemnly guaranteed to protect. The former was helpless and unresisting, but the latter was as brave and courageous as a good woman fighting desperately to the last breath to save her honor. The story of Liege and her valiant defense will thrill every reader of that tragic story. Malines, Antwerp, and Brussels speedily fell; courage alone could not prevail against hundreds of thousands of rough and brutal soldiers, and the greater part of that unhappy country was overrun and occupied by the armies of the Kaiser. Trampling the helpless Belgians under foot, they pressed on into northern France and laid waste its fair fields and pillaged and destroyed its villages and cities. On rushed the tidal wave until, at the Marne, the heroic French, stirred by the memory of the Maid of Orleans, put to flight the violator of the soil of France. [Applause.]

The central powers were not idle in other theaters of war. Their rumbling artillery rolled through the mountains of Serbia and Montenegro and two kingdoms crumbled, and their subjects were driven from their homes and scattered like grains of dust. They hurled their bolts against Roumania, and a whole nation, hungry and naked, was left trembling at their power. Against the Russian armies, deficient in arms and munitions, they sent their swarming minions, well armed and equipped, and seized a large territory in the domain of the Czar. When no longer able to make headway against Russia on the battle field, when the Muscovite armies, at last at bay, doggedly disputed the invader's further advance, resort was had to intrigue and Russian treachery to destroy the morale of the soldiery and effect the destruction of organized opposition to Germany's dream of ambition and eastern conquest. Anarchistic agitators and ranting reformers, with gilded promises upon their lips and German gold in their pockets, deluded the poor Russian people and handed them over like chattels to German slavery. At Brest-Litovsk the crowning infamy of this chapter of shame culminated. There was consummated a false peace, a peace purchased at the price of Russian dishonor and betrayal, a peace that shall not bring the fruits of happiness, but instead a most burdensome bondage—not a peace that permits the Russian people to turn to profitable industry and commerce and to devote their energies to the cultivation of garden and field and lowing herds to satisfy their own wants, but a peace that requires them, as slaves, to supply the sinews of war that other nations may be similarly enslaved—a peace that crushes and oppresses the spirit of the conquered until such a time as their smoldering resentment shall burst into flame and with a terrible revenge shall punish their heartless oppressors. At Brest-Litovsk the curtain went down on a shameful and disgraceful tragedy; the bleeding body of Russia lay writhing like a mighty giant convulsed and gripped by an insidious and deadly poison, with features distorted and drawn with the pain and agony of death.

The Central Empires wheeled their forces and their armies burst through the mountain passes of Italy, and by the strength of numbers and the machinations of conspirators, who deceived and seduced the Italian soldiery, captured many thousands of men and much booty and supplies. From this front the assuring news comes that the drooping Italian spirit has revived, and already in a brilliant allied campaign the intruder has been thrown back across the Piave with frightful loss in life and prisoners.

With the armies on the Russian front released, Germany renewed activity on the west, and in March, 1918, made a determined and powerful drive for the channel ports and for Paris, and, though gaining ground, was prevented by the French, British, and Americans from attaining her objectives. Encouraged by temporary success on this front, the enemy launched another formidable and dangerous attack in May, 1918, and drove the Rheims-Soissons salient far toward Paris to the Marne, where once before her armies had been brought to a halt. At this critical and fateful juncture American troops and marines, at historic Chatteau-Thierry, with dauntless daring and superb spirit, not only halted but hurled back the Hun in disaster and ignominious flight. Just as America entered the war at the moment when the fortunes of the allies were growing desperate, so American soldiers arrived on the battle field just in time to turn seeming Germany victory into utter defeat—just at the moment when the German wave, at its crest, was about to engulf the allied armies, American soldiers, standing like a granite wall against the savage storm, met the enemy's armies, vanquished his choicest shock troops, and scornfully scattered the ragged remnants that survived. [Applause.]

Heroic little France, worn and weary with four years of heartbreaking sacrifice, with her lands harried and torn by the shell and shrapnel of the invader, with a million of her bravest sons sleeping in shallow graves from the Belgian border to the Marne and Verdun, with much of her territory in the foreigner's grasp, with Paris, her pride, her ancient capital, almost in the conqueror's hands, witnessed with wonderment and marvelous admiration this valiant and fearless conduct of American troops, and, inspirited and heartened—yea, thrilled—by the superb spirit and dash of her newly arrived ally, turned an expected German offensive into an allied offensive and forced the armies of the Central Empires to retire from the Marne-Soissons salient in utter confusion and dismay, leaving behind vast stores of supplies and many thousands of prisoners, and marking their retreat by thousands of dead.

The British attacked on the sectors held by their armies, and in a series of brilliant attacks the Americans, French, and British have now driven the enemy almost to the old Hindenburg line; but he will not be permitted to rest there for long. In a little while an American army will be pounding his trenches with artillery and raking his flanks with machine-gun fire so galling that another retreat will be inevitable.

Now that American troops in force are in France giving battle to the enemy may we not inquire how this great army was prepared and placed in the field? Is it not well to ask, How has America met the challenge of the enemy? What has she done to meet the shock of the foe? For answer let us for a moment inquire as to how this great Nation, busy with the pursuits of peace, with her sons engaged in industry and agriculture, with commerce and traffic and the various trades and professions of a thrifty and prosperous country, quickly converted this vast army of peace into a formidable implement and agency for war.

On April 6, 1917, the day upon which the United States stepped out upon the stern stage of war in defense of our right to live and in defense of the lives and safety of her citizens upon the high seas, she had a Regular Army of 5,791 officers and 121,797 men; on June 27, 1918, she had 11,365 officers and 514,376 men. At that time the National Guard in Federal service numbered 3,733 officers and 76,713 men, while on June 27, 1918, there were 17,070 officers and 417,441 men. The Reserve Corps in actual service has grown from 4,000 enlisted men to 131,968 officers and 78,560 enlisted men. The entire Army had grown from 9,524 officers and 202,510 enlisted men to approximately 160,400 officers and 2,010,000 enlisted men on June 27, 1918. Since June 27, 1918, additional calls by draft boards have increased the total strength of the Army to approximately 3,000,000. By the draft act of August 31, 1918, it is estimated that 2,000,000 additional men will be called to the colors as rapidly as facilities for training and equipment will permit. With an army of the magnificent proportions of 5,000,000 men in the field there can be in the "bright lexicon" of American achievement no such word as "fail." Its mighty tramp will be heard around the world, and its cadenced footsteps, like thunder, will shatter the stained glass of the palace at Berlin. Already an army of approximately 1,500,000 men is in France, and soon we may expect the major portion of this great army to strike the enemy a telling blow.

To train and qualify officers to lead the new armies 16 officers' training camps were held at military camps. In the first series, beginning May 15, 1917, there were 27,341 officers graduated; in the second, beginning August 27, 1917, there were 17,237; in the third, beginning in January, 1918, there were 11,657; while in the series beginning May 15, 1918, there were about 14,000 officer candidates in attendance. The War Department has recently inaugurated a series of continuous central officers' training camps which will accommodate thousands of officer candidates.

The War Department prepares and preserves a statistical record of each of the 3,000,000 men now composing the Army and will prepare and preserve such a record of those yet to be called, in which detailed information as to occupation, training, home address, nearest relative, and other data are contained.

For the United States to place in Europe an effective Army something more than the assembling and drilling of millions of men is required—armies must be fed, clothed, armed, equipped, and transported across 3,000 miles of ocean, infested with submarines, lurking in the darkness to assassinate the unwary, and skulking away to the safety of the deep when battle is offered—brave and bold against unarmed passenger ships laden with women and children, but craven and cowardly in the presence of an armed and alert foe.

To clothe our vast forces there had been provided by June 27, 1918, among hundreds of articles, the following: 43,922,000 cotton undershirts, 104,333,000 woolen stockings, 2,340,000 rubber hip boots, 103,028,000 yards of denim cloth, 4,010,000 pairs of arctic overshoes, 27,249,000 pairs of shoes.

To feed the Army supplies of food almost too vast to comprehend have been mobilized and transported to camps and to storehouses in France. There have been purchased 339,593 horses and mules, 18,000 Army trucks, and many other motor-driven vehicles. Among other articles provided are the following:

Hardware and metals.

Articles:	Quantity.
Hammers	2,567,000
Axes	5,121,729
Files	10,870,000

Vehicles and harness.

Articles:
Halters	1,700,000
Escort wagons	129,000
Combat wagons	26,000

Up to May 18, 1918, more than 1,800,000 rifles of all types had been produced by the Ordnance Corps. There are now on hand sufficient rifles for an Army of more than 2,000,000, allowing wastage for a year. Of this number more than 1,000,000 are of the new 1917 model. More than 80,000 machine guns have already been produced and 350,000 have been ordered, as well as 35,000 tractors for hauling heavy cannon.

To provide shells for ordnance, the Government is operating 4 immense plants and 14 private plants are engaged by the Government. Great nitrate and powder plants are being constructed by the United States at an expense of $90,000,000. Private plants are manufacturing for Government account large amounts of powder and other explosives.

Five billion rounds of small-arms ammunition, 80,000,000 projectiles, 1,500,000 pistols, 1,000,000,000 pounds of explosives, 35,000,000 hand grenades, and 18,000,000 rifle grenades have been provided for use against the enemy.

The Medical Corps is operating in the United States 72 base and general hospitals and in France hospitals of a capacity sufficient to accommodate 5 to 10 per cent of the strength of the American Expeditionary Forces.

Against the deadly gas attack first employed in civilized times by the Germans the Medical Corps has developed a gas mask, the best in use.

To house the Army during training 32 cantonments and camps have been constructed in the United States, at which new troops have been and are now being organized and trained.

In France vast storage houses and depots have been erected. These camps at home and abroad represent an expenditure of $1,170,619,040.

The Department of Military Aircraft established in various parts of the United States 28 flying fields. At these fields there have been trained and are now in training thousands of aviators, while many are training in France, Italy, and England. These "American eagles" will drive the enemy from the air and carry the war into Germany. Almost each day brings tidings of some daring and successful exploit of American aviators, and when the temporary delay in production of planes shall have been overcome we may, with confidence, look for splendid service from this branch of the Army.

To provide for office space required by the rapid expansion of departments the Government has erected many immense temporary structures in Washington—houses for clerks to cost $10,000,000 have been authorized, and $50,000,000 have been authorized to build homes for workers in the shipyards.

To construct ships to carry food and supplies to the Army and transport our troops, Congress has authorized the expenditure of more than $2,000,000,000, and the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation on March 5, 1918, had in operation or employed under their direction 151 plants, 85 of which were engaged in wooden construction and 66 on steel ships. Under authority of law 112 German and Austrian ships have been taken over, repaired, and are now in operation. To accommodate our shipping, great docks and terminals have been required at French ports, and lines of railway from ports to the fighting front have been reconstructed and equipped by the United States. These works have necessitated immense outlays, but their need was imperative, and it was the duty of Congress to provide the necessary funds.

The Navy in the first year of the war in officers and men increased more than threefold, having now nearly half a million. There are now, including destroyers, and submarine chasers, and chartered vessels, more than four times as many vessels in the naval service as there were previous to April, 1917. Six new battleships are designed which will be the largest in the world.

The number of men in France or en route to France, including all units that go to make up an entire army, is practically 1,500,000. These troops have been transported by the aid of naval convoys in spite of U boats. Only one transport has been sunk, with a comparatively small loss of life.

This record of preparation for war is a marvelous one, it compels the admiration of the world. It pleases us beyond measure to know that a great democracy in an hour of stress and necessity may arm quickly and effectively when its heart and mind are resolutely set to the task.

It is not without staggering outlays of public money that such prodigious preparation has been made. For the fiscal year 1917 public expenditures, including loans to the allies, amounted to $12,696,702,000. It is estimated that of these expenditures $7,500,000,000 represents permanent assets of value after the war. The aggregate of Government expenditures for all purposes since April 6, 1917, to August 31, 1918, was $17,329,000,000. Treasury estimates forecast an expenditure for the fiscal year, June 30, 1918, to June 30, 1919, for all purposes, of $24,000,000,000.

Thus has America answered the challenge to fight. The Kaiser thought we loved our dollars too much to spend our gold for war. He thought we loved the ways of peace too dearly to leave its pleasant haunts for the rough and rugged road that leads through the land of Mars, but he has found that America is ready to spend the treasure of her wealth and to spill the greater treasure of her blood rather than endure his violation of the sacred rights of her citizens. America's answer to his sneers and jibes will be uttered by the cannon's iron mouth, lips of steel, and tongues of flame will make America's reply.

Our dollars will be molded into shot and shell that shall be sent hurtling into his lines on the western front.

Over against his unholy claim to the divine right of one man to rule we place the divine right of every man to rule his own destiny and his own life under the ordinances of society. To this point at least all the causes and motives of the war find their way—back through all the tangled web of intrigue and diplomacy may be traced the soiled and slimy thread of imperial cunning. To the Emperor's wish to rule the world must be laid all of the tragedy and sorrow and waste and misery that war has wrought.

For this vain dream Belgium was destroyed; for this, that once happy land was filled with the wails and weepings of orphaned childhood and peopled with premature widowhood; for this little children were maimed and butchered, and women were dishonored and despoiled; for this kingly chimera harmless old men, already far on the journey that leads to death, were speeded on their way.

What a contrast between a political system that inspires such an imperial ambition and that of these United States. The Kaiser sees arrayed against him the conscience and the spirit of the civilized world. He knows that his name and that of his Government are execrated and despised in the four corners of the earth. Already he can see beyond the grave and realize how his memory will be linked with authorship of the greatest crime of all the centuries—accursed and damned.

On the other hand, let us turn our eyes for a moment to the tomb of Washington, the great American for whom kingly prerogative possessed no charm and whose only ambition was for his country's weal. On July Fourth it was my privilege to stand at that devoted shrine at Mount Vernon, where lies the dust of him who in life wrote with the sword what had been written with the pen on the day whose anniversary we were celebrating. I saw the ambassadors, ministers, and diplomats of many nations of the globe come like pilgrims to pay honor to the memory of that peerless patriot, to acknowledge the debt of all peoples and races to the greatest of the great, and to cover the vault with flowers in token of gratitude that such a man lived to save and serve the great Republic, which in turn shall save and serve the world. [Applause.] With such a setting and with the civilized nations as an audience, Woodrow Wilson, the splendid spokesman of America and the most commanding figure on the planet [applause], delivered an eloquent and thrilling address that embalmed in matchless language the significance of the day, the forces that centered in the life of Washington, and their recognition and appreciation by the representatives of the nations of the earth.

Between the ideals of Potsdam and those of Mount Vernon the irrepressible conflict has begun, and it shall not end until the former feels the might and strength of the latter—not until the shade of Washington startles the Emperor from his distempered dreams to the realization that the world has passed beyond the era of divine right to rule—that the period of imperial tyranny has vanished with the spectered ghosts that fear to walk where freemen dwell. [Applause.]

The spirit and heart of America are stirred by this war to their very depths; with unbending purpose the people are set upon waging the war to a speedy and successful issue. To the Government's call to war service the country has responded with superb patriotism. There rushed to the colors hundreds of thousands of the finest youth of the land, and other thousands above the age limit begged for permission to enlist.

Government loans of each issue of liberty bonds have been and in the future will be oversubscribed by the people of the United States, willing and anxious to make sacrifices to meet the Nation's demands. Thousands of committees of public-spirited citizens have devoted their time and energies in conducting liberty loan campaigns, thrift stamp sales, and other war activities. Millions have been gladly contributed to the Young Men's Christian Association in order that this organization may go with the boys to France and keep before them the sign of the cross and around them the wholesome influences of home.

With a glad generosity the country has poured millions into the treasury of the Red Cross. Every appeal of this great instrument of mercy has been more than met.

The women of America have met the tasks of war with nobility and unselfish service. [Applause.] They have flocked to Red Cross rooms in city and village and hamlet and rural community, and with needle and yarn and with bandage and dressing have toiled unremittingly. Inspired by the thought that each sock or sweater or cap might bring comfort to some lad in a damp and dark trench in France, they have mingled their love and tenderness with the fabric formed and fashioned by their busy fingers. With a fortitude that excels the traditions of Sparta, they have sent their husbands and sons to the fighting lines. [Applause.]

With straining vision that reaches to the battle fields of Europe, strewn with maimed and wounded, they have made hundreds of thousands of bandages and surgical dressings to bind up the wounds and stanch the blood of the brave troops that are to fight our battles on foreign soil; their hearts are in France with the colors, their spirits are keeping watch and guard over the men with the flag. [Applause.] The same spirit of determination pervades every branch of our fighting forces, and by that token the American Army will be resistless when its full strength is put afield.

A few days ago I chanced to be at the Union Railway Station in Washington, and there witnessed a scene that shall not soon fade from the canvas of memory. Troop trains were departing for embarkation ports and companies and regiments were entraining. Column after column of fine, athletic, alert young soldiers, with heads erect and quickened step, cheered as they marched with military precision to embark upon a journey which they welcomed with joy; cheering because theirs is the task to cross 3,000 miles of turbulent sea, where the stealthy and crafty assassins of the deep lie in wait, with deadly torpedo poised, to strike in the dark, that they may vindicate upon the plains of Picardy and the fields of Flanders the principles and ideals for which the United States was at last forced to fight. [Applause.]

There can be nothing more inspiring, nothing that offers greater promise for the future, than the marvelous spirit of our troops; not there the furtive or slinking gaze of one afraid; not there the hesitant or halting steps of one reluctant to go where the fighting is fiercest; not there the faint heart that trembles and quakes before the "baptism of fire"; but with uplifted, determined faces, with resolute and steady step, with confident and unwavering purpose, they go to meet the enemy in the red arena of battle. That they shall fitly and nobly acquit themselves there is no fear; to their prowess and bravery, in the faith that their performances will comport with the finest and most heroic traditions of American arms, the United States has confided all that she is and all that she hopes to be—yea, has confided the very safety and life of the Republic. That new and thrilling chapters will be added to the glorious annals of America on both land and sea will follow "as surely as the night the day."

While our enemy is still strong and powerful; while he is yet able to marshal millions in the field; while he is yet in possession of much of the territory of the allies, victory approaches nearer as each day wheels into night—our final triumph is hastening as the weeks and months are unwound from the reel of time. Our sacrifices of men and money, the anguish and tears of American womanhood—these things shall not be spent in vain. The God of Justice will not permit the Hohenzollerns to trample into the lifeless and listless dust the liberties of the whole world; civilization shall not be again plunged into the impenetrable gloom of the Dark Ages. The clock that strikes the hours of destiny, that records the struggles by which man has climbed from savagery to enlightenment, that marvelous chronometer that is moved by mystic forces which we can not always fathom, shall not turn its hands backward a thousand years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman from North Carolina give me two minutes more?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The astrologer can not find it written in the stars, the soothsayer can point neither to omen nor augury, it can not be discovered graven upon cabalistic stone or tablet that "kultur" shall extinguish the "light of the West."

Twenty-four hundred years ago the Persian kings overran and conquered Asia and, sweeping westward with vast forces, sought to crush the liberties and civilization of Greece and of Europe, but Miltiades and his little band of Greeks hurled the oriental horde back upon the shores whence it came. In 451 A. D. there emerged from the wild plains and savage fastnesses of Central Asia a countless swarm of barbarian Huns that rushed across southeastern Europe like a blistering blight, ravaging and wasting lands and cities and leaving in its wake nought but monuments of its vandalism and barbarity.

Attila, like his German imitator, claimed intimate contact and relation with God—he was the chosen conqueror Almighty. The Romans and their allies met him at Chalons and, though Rome was weakened and tottering to her fall, she was spared long enough to drive back with frightful slaughter the Hunnish host and add a crowning contribution to the "glory that was hers." [Applause.] The Fates had not so ordered the future that Attila's poisonous breath should wither and kill the culture of Greece on whose mystic mountain tops they had dwelt. In 723 A. D. the turbaned Arabs from the parched deserts of Africa poured through the passes of the Pyrenees and dashed across what is now France with the scimetar in one hand and the Koran in the other, with the one enforcing homage to the other and to Allah, but Charles of the Hammer shattered and scattered the frenzied fanatics and saved Christianity from conquest by the Crescent.

The same wild lust for power and dominion that generated these invasions of the past inspires the central powers in the mighty struggle in which we are grappling; now no less than in former times courage and patriotism shall halt the millions of the enemy and rescue the peoples of the earth from conquest, their liberties from destruction, and shall preserve their lives and the lives of their children from oppression by the most insupportable political bondage of modern times and shall save the institutions and agencies of self-government from prostitution to the selfish tyranny of imperial mastery.

The light is breaking through the clouds that have frowned and lowered upon the fortunes of the allies. We saw a glimmer of light at Seicheypres when American troops first went into action; we caught a vision of it when the drive for Paris and the channel ports was halted before Amiens; when the Austrians were thrown across the Piave, through the Italian sky it shot a brilliant shaft that brightened and cheered our lines from the Adriatic to the North Sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one more minute to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It grew brighter and clearer at Bellieu Wood and Chateau Thierry, and in the German retreat to the Hindenburg line it dazzled us with its gladsome rays.

As each American lad dons the uniform of his country, as each one drop the implements of industry or agriculture, as each one leaves store or office to grasp the rifle and bayonet, that light in the heavens shall grow in power until its splendor is greater than ever "beat upon a throne." [Applause.] There it is. Can not you see it now—the light of victory set in the arching azure as pledge that the God of Battles "is with us yet, is with us yet." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I agree with all the complimentary things which have been said about the Committee on Ways and Means, both as to the skill with which they have drawn this bill and as to the nonpartisan character of the committee. I appreciate that they had a tremendous task to draw a bill which would produce $8,000,000,000, and so I think that criticism should be very sparing in connection with any of the items.

I agree also that in considering the bill the interests of the United States should be in all respects paramount. I do not believe that the interests of any individual or any class should stand in the way of the bill or any provision thereof, unless such provision would have a broad effect and a detrimental effect on the United States itself, and on the raising of future revenue. But I shall take the few minutes which I have to call attention to two matters in the bill which, it seems to me, are detrimental and will be detrimental to the business interests of this country. The first relates to that provision of the bill taxing net incomes of corporations at the rate of 18 per cent and exempting so much of the income as is paid out in dividends, which results, of course, in a punitive tax of 6 per cent on all the income of the corporation which is not paid out in dividends. Of course the result of that is to tempt all corporations to pay out all their earnings in dividends.

Now, so far as manufacturing is concerned, with which I am most familiar, it is an axiom which is well known and the result of generations of experience that any corporation which does pay out all its earnings in dividends is sure, sooner or later, to fail. Because, naturally, fluctuations of business will bring about lean years, in which it is absolutely necessary to have the reserves of good years in order to keep the corporation on its feet.

It is also true that the goods which all corporations produce—or all manufacturing corporations, at least—are apt to get out of style at times, and the so-called inventory of the corporation will shrink. You have to provide for that. In other words, it is really a profligate way of doing business to pay out all of your earnings in dividends. It seems to me also that if that is done with the notion that the Nation at the present moment is going to get more of an income tax, it will be fallacious, or if it is done with the notion that the Government is going to get more subscriptions to bonds, that will be fallacious; because I think it will be found that those corporations which have not paid out all their earnings in dividends and have retained some as a surplus have been inclined, and are still inclined, to put that surplus into United States bonds, both from patriotism and on account of the fact that the bonds are the surest investment we know of, and the most easily convertible into cash when cash is wanted.

I think a provision could easily be put into the bill so that 6 per cent might be waived if the undivided surplus is put into United States bonds; and I am sure that will produce a greater sale of bonds than if it were paid out in dividends and divided among the small stockholders, who may or may not purchase bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. With pleasure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask the gentleman a question, because he is a student of this subject. I myself have some doubt as to the wisdom of this provision; but the committee was largely influenced by the fact that there seemed to be a large number of corporations in this country controlled in some cases by very rich men who want to avoid at all hazards the payment of taxes, and who will not therefore favor the distribution of dividends. From that point of view does not the gentleman think it is perhaps a wise policy to give a bonus for the distribution of dividends?

Mr. MERRITT. I think the number of such corporations must be very small compared to the number of legitimate corporations, and I do think it is a very decided detriment to try to force—I do not suppose that is exactly the right expression—to try to tempt them to pay out their earnings; but I should think the kind of corporations that the gentleman speaks of might be reached in some way, such as I mentioned, by making the tax dependent on whether or not they invested their surplus in United States bonds. That is what I think could be done. But I do think it tends toward an uneconomic use of the earnings of corporations to insist, at the risk of a penalty, that they shall pay them all out in dividends in the year in which they are earned.

Mr. PLATT. Is there not a provision in the present law under which their surplus can be invested in United States bonds?

Mr. MERRITT. There is, but I think it is taken out of this bill.

Mr. PLATT. There ought to be such a provision.

Mr. MERRITT. There is one other matter contained in the bill——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to say that the pending bill contains a provision which is mandatory, requiring the paying out of all earnings in dividends?

Mr. MERRITT. It does not require it, but it provides that if they are not paid out the undivided profits shall be subject to a supertax of 6 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that would force the paying out of all earnings?

Mr. MERRITT. I do not think it will force it in all cases, because the very prudent ones would retain it and pay the tax, but, of course, the tendency would be to save that 6 per cent by paying out all earnings.

There is one other provision to which I will allude very briefly, that has to do with the so-called estate tax, which, it seems to me, differs from almost all the rest of the bill in that it is really not strictly a tax, but rather a confiscation of principal. Now, of course, in considering the great estates we are apt to think of the get-rich-quick estates, those that have been made in a short period of time, but all through New England, where I come from, there are a great many large estates which have been built up by the prudent accumulations of years, and it seems to me that you are going into a new field when you confiscate a large part of those great estates. The highest bracket is 40 per cent. Even as to that I should hold to my principle that if this were solely to the advantage of the United States it could be defended, but I do not think it is. It seems to me that this is what might be called profligate taxation. Of course, capital is something which can not be put away in a pigeonhole or in a safe deposit box and be inert and still be of any use to the man who holds it.

It must be used, and the reason why it is capital is because it is savings from previous earnings. Now, if the United States reaches out and takes those savings for a war tax, of course they are going to be dissipated, so that you will diminish the capital of this country by that much, so diminishing the earning power of the country by that much and diminishing possible future taxation by that much. It strikes me, gentlemen, that it is exactly the same thing as we have seen happening in Russia, where the Bolsheviki have used the seed wheat and eaten it up, and so can not plant their crop. It is like going to a mechanic and saying, "We are going to take your tools away from you." He will say, "All right, if that is for the interest of the United States; but if you do, I can not do any more work." If you go to the capitalist, to the bank, to the estate and say, "I am going to take your savings of years and spend them on the manufacture of munitions of war," or anything else, so that they will disappear, you will take away from capital its tools, so that in future it can not do its work and can not help the United States as otherwise it would. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE].

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this large revenue bill as it is reported from the committee, and I will also take advantage of the time allotted to me to make a few observations which I think should be made.

Much has been said in condemnation of the McLemore resolution during this campaign year, but as long as these words of condemnation and misrepresentation came from a prejudiced, a perjured, and a paid press and from the so-called National Security League and the American Defense Society, of New York City, I had nothing to say. Since, however, the Democratic national congressional committee has deemed it expedient to quote the language of the National Security League in a circular letter which it has sent to the Democratic Members of this House I feel it my duty as an American citizen and as a Democratic Member of this House to resent the imputation which emanates from that grafting concern known as the National Security League and whose chief ambition now, it seems, is to asperse the character of those who do not subscribe to its views. The language used by the National Security League occurred in what is called a chart showing the "Americanism" or "patriotism" of each Member of Congress, and its language, as quoted by the Democratic national congressional committee in its circular letter, is as follows:

McLemore resolution: This resolution was to the effect that American citizens should forego their natural, legal, and constitutional rights to travel on the high seas.

Mr. Chairman, a more malicious falsehood or a more willful misrepresentation was never uttered than is contained in these words sent out by the National Security League, so called, and repeated in a circular letter sent out by the Democratic national congressional committee to the Democratic Members of this Congress. It is a lie out of the whole cloth, and I need no better refutation of the malicious slander than the resolution itself, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fourth Congress of the United States do, and it hereby solemnly does, request the President to warn all American citizens, within the borders of the United States or its possessions or elsewhere, to refrain from traveling on any or all ships of any and all of the powers now or in future at war, which ship or ships shall mount guns, whether such ship be frankly avowed a part of the naval forces of the power whose flag it flies or shall be called a merchant ship or otherwise, and whether such gun or other armament be called "offensive" or "defensive"; and in case American citizens do travel on such armed belligerent ships that they do so at their own risk.

Mr. Chairman, this resolution was introduced in the House on the 17th day of February, 1916, and it was based on a note issued by the Secretary of State the 27th of January, 1916, and which note questioned the right of a belligerent nation in time of war to arm its merchant vessels. I was also guided in part by a warning issued by England to her subjects in the Far East during the war between Russia and Japan, which warning was sent out to British subjects, judging from the copy I have in my possession, through the English consulate at Shanghai. That warning read as follows:

All subjects of the Crown are notified that the British Government will not undertake to be responsib e for the safety of any British subject leaving this port on a ship of either of the belligerent nations.

This is the common-sense warning England issued through her consulate at Shanghai, and, it is presumed, the same warning was sent to her consulates of other Far East ports. When I introduced my resolution we were at peace with Germany, the sinking of the Lusitania, which was a good cause for a declaration of war, having been recognized by our Government as "a closed incident." We had warned our citizens to get out of Mexico, although they had gone there and invested their all under treaty rights and a guarantee of the Mexican constitution and laws. More than 500 of them—men, women, and children—were ruthlessly murdered by the Mexicans and their property destroyed, but we afforded them no protection whatever, our only answer to their appeals being to "get out." Mr. Speaker, I could not by any stretch of my imagination, bring myself to believe that American citizens traveling on the armed boats of the nations then at war and in belligerent waters, and seeking pleasure or business, had rights that were any more sacred than the rights of those Americans who went to Mexico and invested their money under treaty rights and a guaranty of the Mexican constitution and laws, and nothing has happened to shake me in that belief.

My resolution did not prohibit any American from traveling on any boat on which he might secure passage. It did propose, however, that if he took passage on an armed boat of any one of the nations then at war, sailing in belligerent waters, that he would do so at his own risk and without involving this country in war, in case the boat on which he sailed was attacked, and perhaps sunk, by an enemy submarine. My resolution was tabled, as the easiest way of getting rid of it, yet of all who spoke against it—and there were many—not one had the courage to say that the resolution was wrong in principle. Their excuse was that they did not wish to interfere with the President's foreign policy, and yet about the only foreign policy, at that time, on which the President was outspoken was his policy toward Mexico—a policy that but few men in this House indorsed, although they may have said little in this regard outside the cloakroom. The only intention of the resolution was to prevent the United States from becoming entangled in the European conflict, and it was furthest from my desire to interfere with the President's foreign policy. After the resolution was tabled the supporters of the President that year used the slogan, "He kept us out of war," and it was this slogan that caused the women of California and Kansas to vote for Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact not generally known that shortly after the tabling of the resolution the State Department issued an order which virtually put into effect all that the McLemore resolution was intended to do.

At the time the resolution was introduced we were not at war with Germany nor did the people generally dream that we would soon be sending troops to Europe to put down German autocracy. There was one concern, however, that did dream of war with Germany, and it did everything in its power to force the United States into the conflict. I speak of the National Security League, an institution that was organized long before the United States entered into the war and whose sole object was to get this country involved in the European struggle—an institution that was financed by the war profiteers.

The founder of this institution, Mr. Chairman, was an Englishman by birth, and how well he succeeded in his efforts time has only too well proven. And after war had been declared by the United States against Germany the next move of this so-called National Security League was to force upon the country conscription and compulsory military training, and in this work it was assisted by the so-called American Defense Society, and both managed to work, in some way, through the commercial organizations of the different States of the Union, which held so-called mass meetings at their respective cities or towns and then sent telegrams, paid for by the two New York institutions, to their Congressmen expressing the wish of the mass meetings, so called.

Mr. Chairman, it may not be out of place to state that the National Security League is composed of as big a bunch of grafters as ever operated in any country, if we except the Anti-Saloon League, and the league is financed by war profiteers. I understand that the Navy League, since it was put out of commission, and righteously so, by the Secretary of the Navy, is affiliated in some way with this National Security League, which would be only natural, as birds of a feather are known to flock together, and there is usually a common cause between grafters.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me get back to the McLemore resolution. That resolution was introduced in all sincerity, and, as I have previously stated, its sole purpose was to keep this country from becoming involved in the European war, especially after we had passed up the Lusitania incident. That resolution lay in the House Committee on Foreign Relations for more than a week, nor was it reported until the President demanded it, and then it was reported in its entirety to the Rules Committee without a chance being given me to amend it by cutting out the "whereases"—which are a resolution's arguments—and with the recommendation that it "do not pass." The same thing occurred in the Rules Committee, which reported it in its entirety, and this committee, so fearful that it would pass the House, reported it with a rule that it was to be debated a certain number of hours and at the end of that time that it be tabled under the previous question, which precluded any chance of amending it, the Rules Committee, as the Committee on Foreign Relations had done, reporting the resolution in full and precluding any chance to amend it.

It was the intention of the gentleman having the time in charge on the floor, and the intention was pretty well adhered to, to run the steam roller over the resolution and in this he was ably assisted by the Rules Committee. The time was equally divided between the Democrats and Republicans, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] being in charge of the Democratic time and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] being in charge of the time allotted to the Republicans.

Having introduced the resolution, I naturally supposed I would be granted a little time to speak to it, but when I asked for time from the Democratic manager I was coldly turned down, and I met with the same result from the Republican manager, both of whom, I presume, were acting under orders from higher up. The only Democrat, as I now remember, who favored the resolution and was given any time was the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], who got 10 minutes from the Republican manager. When the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] learned that I had been denied any time he went in person to the manager of the time of the Democratic side, so he informed me, and told him that it was an outrage that I should be denied time in which to defend my resolution. According to Mr. SISSON, this gentleman, out of the goodness of his heart, and, presumably, in violation of his instructions from higher up, agreed to give me four minutes. When my name was called, however, I was informed that the time allotted me was only two minutes, and, of course, I could do nothing more in this short period than thank the gentleman from Virginia for his generosity in granting me so much time and returning to him the unused portion of it, and which he most graciously accepted, as they all do when acting under orders.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not all. The Atlanta Journal of August 18, 1918, printed a speech of Congressman HOWARD, then a candidate for United States Senator, in which the Congressman is quoted as follows:

> It is pretty hard to have yourself treated worse than * * * disloyal MCLEMORE.

Mr. Chairman, knowing how unreliable some newspapers are I wrote Mr. HOWARD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1918.

Hon. W. S. HOWARD,
Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR SIR: In your speech, as published in yesterday's Atlanta Journal, you refer to me as the "disloyal MCLEMORE." In view of the friendly relations that have existed between us since our first acquaintance, and because of the falsity of the charge, I am loath to believe that you were quoted correctly, nor will I believe so until I hear from you.

Very truly, yours, JEFF: MCLEMORE.

This letter was written on August 19, but so far I have not heard from Mr. HOWARD. I propose, however, to make the paper which published the statement prove its charge, and I suppose Mr. HOWARD will answer my letter as soon as he gets the time from his campaign, which has no doubt been absorbing all of his time. The Atlanta Journal further quotes Mr. HOWARD, as follows:

> I stood on the floor of the House and denounced the supporters of the cowardly and infamous McLemore resolution.

Mr. HOWARD occupies the floor of the House so often when he is here that nobody takes seriously anything he may say, and his denunciation of the supporters of the McLemore resolution, if he did denounce them, attracted no attention out of the ordinary. However, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 7, 1916, the day the resolution was debated and tabled, fails to show that Mr. HOWARD opened his mouth against the resolution save to vote to table it, but the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, the day following, does show an "extension of remarks" on the McLemore resolution, by Mr. HOWARD, although I fail to find in the "remarks" any special denunciation of those who favored the resolution. In fact, I think Mr. HOWARD was bamming those to whom he spoke in his speech which is printed in the Atlanta Journal of the date heretofore mentioned, and for a bammer Mr. HOWARD is equal to all occasions. I suppose, however, he will answer my letter now that his campaign is at an end, or will be after to-day.

Mr. Chairman, I have been charged by a prejudiced, a perjured, and a paid press with being a critic of the President. I deny the imputation most emphatically. I regard the President as a great man who is doing his best for this country; but I do not feel that he is infallible, and I have differed from him on some of his policies. I did not subscribe to his Mexican policy, and I still think he made a mistake when he withdrew our troops from Mexico after once landing them at Vera Cruz. I had an idea when I first came here as a representative of the people that Congress was a coordinate branch of the Government, but I had not been here long before I discovered that I had made a mistake, and that, instead, it was subordinate and not coordinate. I still have an idea, however, that it is a coordinate branch of the Government, or should be, and for so thinking some people charge that I am disloyal—that is, they charge it when they are striving for administration favors, although their opinion, privately expressed, may be very different.

Mr. Chairman, since war has been declared I have been with the administration on practically everything it has declared for, with three exceptions, namely:

First. I voted against conscription, and in doing so I stood with the majority of the Military Committee and cast my vote with Chairman DENT, of the committee, Speaker CLARK, and Mr. KITCHIN, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and all three of whom are good men, honest, old-time Democrats, and men who have the courage of their convictions on the floor as well as in the cloakroom, and I had rather err with these men than shine with some others that I know of. All of our wars have been won with volunteers, and I thought it a good idea to first give those a chance to show their patriotism who were anxious for war and were shouting for it on every occasion. I also thought it proper to conscript incomes as well as human lives, but when I offered an amendment to that effect I failed to get anywhere with it.

Second. I voted to let Col. Roosevelt raise an army of volunteers and go to Europe. I thought such an army would have a good effect on our allies and a depressing effect on our enemies; but my wishes in this respect were of no avail, and Col. Roosevelt could do nothing more than send his four sons to the battle front, one of whom has died a hero's death, and the others—at least two of them—have been wounded.

Third. I voted against the bill creating Herbert Hoover food dictator and placing at his command $162,500,000 of the people's money to do with as he pleased. Mr. Hoover had not been a resident of the United States for 23 years, had never in his life voted in this country, and was not a qualified voter when he was created food dictator and given $162,500,000 of the people's money to use as he saw, or may see, proper. He is a mining engineer, a resident of London, England, where he owns a home and where his business interests are established, and I thought if we were to have a food dictator we should select him from our own people—a man who knows something of American conditions and who has the interests of the American people at heart, especially the farmers of the country, of whom Mr. Hoover is now the dictator.

Mr. Chairman, the law under which this food dictator was created explicitly says that the dictator must file a monthly report with the Speaker and the Clerk of the House. I can not find, however, that he has ever filed but two reports, and these about the same time, which shows the contempt he has for the law under which he was created.

But I had still another reason for voting as I did on this food-dictatorship proposition. Shortly before Mr. Hoover was made food dictator the Secretary of Agriculture published over his own name a letter, of which the following are excerpts:

There is nothing in the food situation of the country which justifies hysterical thinking or action.

The department and all agricultural agencies of the country are giving definite and careful attention to these problems. The Federal Government, through several of its departments, is giving continuous consideration to the immediate problems presented and to the possibility of remedial legislation.

The solution will certainly not involve a Federal dictatorship, and ft is highly unlikely that it will involve a dictatorship in any State or community

America does not take kindly to dictators. The difficulties in any event would be very nearly insuperable. We have a continent to deal with, and there are difficulties of double jurisdiction.

Consider, for instance, the matter of fixing a minimum price. The Federal Government could deal only with commodities passing into interstate commerce. The States might be hampered in attempting to fix prices.

We are maintaining a Department of Agriculture at a cost of some $30,000,000 a year to the taxpayers of the country. The department has agricultural experts of all kinds, and it seems to me that, as the Secretary of Agriculture intimated in his published letter, these paid experts could have looked after this food situation and thus saved to the contry $162,500,000 of the people's money, and perhaps more before it is over with. In casting my vote on the food-control bill, I voted with the gentleman from Virginia, Hon. CARTER GLASS, and I am sure no one has charged Mr. GLASS with being disloyal.

With these three exceptions, Mr. Chairman, I have stood with the administration on practically all of its war demands, and I have voted with the administration on some measures which others did not—others who had as good a right as I had, if not a better one, to stand by the administration, but who preferred to curry favor with the newspapers on the occasions of which I speak rather than with the President.

But getting back to the McLemore resolution I wish to state that that resolution was introduced in the best of faith and for no other purpose than to keep us out of the European war. It meant no reflection on the administration, and among its supporters were such men as Uncle JOE CANNON, Minority Leader JAMES R. MANN, Mr. LENROOT, since elected United States Senator, and many others, Democrats as well as Republicans, and whose Americanism is beyond questioning. A prejudiced, a perjured, and a paid press has had much to say in condemnation of this resolution, and I have been made the victim of all manner of slander and misrepresentation by this same press. But "thrice armed is he who hath his quarrel just," and I have survived the slander and misrepresentation, although it may have done me some harm among those people who do not know me personally. I did not wish to see my country become involved in foreign entanglements that will cost thousands of the lives of the country's manhood and billions of dollars which future generations will have to pay, and in introducing my resolution I tracked pretty closely President Washington, who, on the 22d of April, 1793, issued the following proclamation:

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands on the one part and France on the other; and the duty and interests of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial to the belligerent powers, I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers, respectively, and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forefeiture; and, further, that I have given instructions to those officers to whom it belongs to cause prosecution to be instituted against all persons who shall within the cognizance of the courts of the United States violate the law of nations with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

So careful was President Washington to avoid getting this country involved in foreign entanglements that he not only issued this proclamation, but he also declined to ask for the liberation of Lafayette, who was confined for several years in the prison of Olmutz. As soon as Napoleon came into power, however, he not only asked for but demanded the liberation of Lafayette. Napoleon's demand was at once acceded to, and the Austrians gave Lafayette his freedom. After that, however, Lafayette was never Napoleon's friend and showed his French nature by doing Napoleon harm whenever he could. In this respect he was not different from the Frenchmen of to-day, who charge our soldiers two or three times as much as they do French or English soldiers for the same articles, although the American soldiers have been the saviors of France. Mr. Chairman, show me a Latin country and I will show you a manhood that thinks first of itself.

Before I close these observations let me call attention to the fact that of 18 Congressmen from Texas, 8 voted against tabling the McLemore resolution, 7 voted to table it, and 3 are recorded as not voting. I only mention this to show that I did not stand alone among the Texas delegation in supporting the resolution.

One thing more, Mr. Chairman. I would like to call attention to before I conclude. A few days ago a gentleman in a high official position, in a very partisan speech, took occasion to criticize the President and one of his friends, the Hon. E. M. House. This spokesman, of course, was a Republican, and his idea was to make political capital out of his speech. What he said, however, in criticism of these gentlemen gave more honor to himself than it reflected discredit on the gentlemen he attempted to criticize. In fact, he was more honored in the breach than in the observance. As far as the President is concerned, he is in a position to defend himself and can do so in a more able manner than I can. I can not resist the temptation, however, to say to the gentleman that in abusing the President he elevated himself. The other gentleman he saw fit to abuse, being a private citizen, has no way to defend himself from the aspersions of this bully, who takes advantage of his official position to asperse the character of a man who is in every respect his superior. Col. E. M. House is one of the most unassuming of men. I have known him long and intimately, and I can say in all candor that no truer gentleman or better citizen ever lived. He is the least obtrusive of men, he wants no official job, and those who know him best love him most. He never gives his advice unless it is asked for, and in having him for a friend and adviser the President is certainly to be congratulated. Even Col. George Harvey, in a recent issue of his War Weekly, spoke in high praise of some of the advice Col. House had given the President, and praise from Col. Harvey is praise indeed. Col. House is a man among men, and I am sure if the gentleman who spoke hastily and slanderously of him had known him as I do, his language referring to Col. House would have been the reverse of what it was. I have been told that for a Member of the House to take issue with a Member of the higher body is improper and out of place. But, Mr. Chairman, when a Member of the Senate for a political purpose indulges in slander of a President and of a good citizen of the United States he should be told so in plain and unequivocal language. If all men in this country—and this includes Members of the United States Senate—were honest with themselves and their fellow men, the country would be that much better off. Col. House is my friend, and as such I throw back the contumely that has been wantonly and without cause or provocation thrust upon him by one who shields himself behind the cloak of the United States Senate, but who would not personally dare indulge in the language he used on the Senate floor, for fear of getting called down, as he deserves to be.

In concluding my speech, Mr. Chairman, let me call attention to the fact that Hon. William Kent, of California, voted against tabling the McLemore resolution, and yet after that Mr. Kent was appointed by the President to a high official position, which is conclusive evidence, in my mind, that the President did not regard a vote for the McLemore resolution as an unpardonable sin. A Democratic Member of the Senate, who is regarded as a spokesman for the administration in that body, and who recently went to Europe on a mission for the administration, said to me shortly after we had declared war against Germany, that he had made a mistake in opposing my resolution and that Congress had made a fatal error in not adopting it. This was said to me in the presence of others and without any solicitation on my part. This Senator is a candidate for reelection and has the support of the administration.

Mr. Chairman, I was the first member of the Texas delegation to come out unreservedly for preparedness. That was before the President had changed his views on this proposition, and for so announcing my preparedness ideas I was criticized by some of my colleagues. This criticism ceased, however, as soon as the President announced that he thought preparedness was the proper thing. I did not want preparedness for offensive purposes, but rather that we might be in a position to defend ourselves against the encroachment of any foreign power. But since then times have changed—changed in a way I did not anticipate, nor did many others anticipate differently. But we now have a war to prosecute, and I am in favor of prosecuting that war to a successful and speedy termination, and in every way that we possibly can, both with man power and with money power, and prosecuting it to the bitter end, nor stop to count the result until our victory is won.

In speaking of a prejudiced, perjured, and paid press, I did not mean to convey the impression that all of our newspapers come under this class. I am an old newspaper man myself, and I would not, under any consideration, asperse the character of my fellow newspaper men as a whole. But, Mr. Chairman, we have a lot of newspapers and newspaper men that are out for the money they may make, and it is no difference to them how this money may come in. We also have a lot of clean newspapers and newspaper men that could not be deterred from the course of honesty by all the money in the land, and they would be a credit to any country. In the Sixty-fourth Congress, on page 3321 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, appears the following remarkable statement:

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD at this point a statement showing the newspaper combination, which explains their activity in this war matter, just discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

"In March, 1915, the J. P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and powder interests, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press of the United States.

"These 12 men worked the problem out by selecting 179 newspapers, and then began, by an elimination process, to retain only those necessary for the purpose of controlling the general policy of the daily press throughout the country. They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers. The 25 papers were agreed upon; emissaries were sent to purchase the policy, national and international, of these papers; an agreement was reached; the policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month; an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers.

"This contract is in existence at the present time, and it accounts for the news columns of the daily press of the country being filled with all sorts of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes.

"This policy also included the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served. The effectiveness of this scheme has been conclusively demonstrated by the character of stuff carried in the daily press throughout the country since March, 1915. They have resorted to anything necessary to commercialize public sentiment and sandbag the National Congress into making extravagant and wasteful appropriations for the Army and Navy under the false pretense that it was necessary. Their stock argument is that it is 'patriotism.' They are playing on every prejudice and passion of the American people."

Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that this statement followed a resolution introduced by a Member from Pennsylvania to investigate these newspapers that sold themselves and their influence to the highest bidder, but nothing ever came of the resolution and it did not even get out of the committee to which it was referred. I do not think it yet too late to investigate this bunch of slanderers and crooks, although, to keep down a sensation, the friends of honest endeavor may deem it best to keep down the investigation until the war is at an end. It will, I presume, be then so late that the miscreants will claim exemption from investigation by pleading the statute of limitation. These newspapers have been unmerciful in their criticism of Postmaster General Burleson and Mr. George Creel because these men sought to curb these paid newspapers in their wilful and malicious misrepresentations. I think Mr. Burleson and Mr. Creel were both right, and I think Congress showed its lack of courage when it failed to give them the powers they asked for, that they might have made this misleading press at least halfway decent.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter to which I wish to call attention. We have at work for our Government a lot of dollar-a-year patriots. Some of these patriots are members of big firms that get big Government contracts, while others are allowed expense accounts that are larger than any salaries they ever received in their lives. These matters should be looked into, although I am sure, judging from the past, and which is the only way we can judge the future, that nothing will be done and that this riot of spending the people's money will continue until the end of the war and then nobody will be to blame, as it will be too late to then bring the matter up for consideration, and to bring the matter up now might cause one to be charged with disloyalty. One of these dollar-a-year patriots, who is a Wall Street operator, made a tremendous sum of money not long ago because of a certain leak which is still fresh within the minds of the public; and it is presumed that his firm also made a large sum of money when, a few days ago, his official statement caused the price of cotton to fall more than $20 a bale. These are the class of individuals that have been called in to run our Government, and I do not believe there is any other country under the sun save the United States that would stand for them for even a moment. Instead of being on the firing line they are given positions far away from danger, and when this war is ended there will be so many multimillionaires that a millionaire will be regarded as a very ordinary person. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, on October 1, 1915, William II, King of Prussia and German Emperor, sent this message in reply to a message of congratulation by the Prussian Ministry:

"My warmest thanks to the Ministry of State for its inspiring words by which it renewed on the day of the 500th anniversary of the reign of my House over Brandenburg, its vow of loyalty.

"In reviewing half a thousand years of Brandenburg-Prussian History, God's guidance appears to have been wonderful. Across the depths and the heights, my House has been raised from the Electoral hat to the Imperial Crown; and a small Mark to the center of the German Empire, whose strength and power have been so brilliantly proved to friend and foe in the present War of the Nations, the greatest of all times."

What he calls the greatest War of all times is a War of reasoned cruelty and horror unparalleled in human history. When he claims God's guidance, he slanders God.

Here are three orders illustrating the Prussian idea of "Strength and Power" under "God's Guidance."

1—"With my authorization the General commanding these troops has reduced the town to ashes and has had 110 persons shot." (Proclamation by General Von Bulow Aug. 22, 1914.)

2—"In future, the inhabitants of places situated near railways and telegraph lines which have been destroyed will be punished without mercy whether they are guilty of this destruction or not. . . . the hostages that have been taken in all such places will be shot immediately." (Proclamation by General Von Der Goltz, Brussels, Oct. 5, 1914.)

3—"Beginning with today, no more prisoners are to be taken—all prisoners are to be put to death. The wounded, whether armed or not, are to be put to death. Prisoners, even when they are organized in large units, are to be put to death. No living man is to remain behind us. (Orders of the day by General Stenger, Commander of the 58th Brigade, Aug. 28, 1914, in France.)

THE HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE

Let us examine the historic evolution of this Mark Brandenburg and the House of Hohenzollern.

The Holy Roman Empire, which Voltaire said was neither Holy nor Roman nor an Empire, was the name given originally to the Empire erected by Charlemagne in Western Europe, after his Coronation in 800.

Technically, it is the name applied to the Roman Empire of the so-called German Nation inaugurated in 962 by Otho the Great.

From that time on, some German King was generally Emperor and after 1438, all the Emperors but two belonged to the House of Hapsburg.

The early Kings were elected by the chief men of their respective Kingdoms and the Kings in turn elected the Emperor, but finally the Emperor was chosen by Electors and the Margrave of Brandenburg was made one of seven Electors of the Empire in 1356 by the Golden Bull of Charles IV.

THE KINGDOM OF PRUSSIA.

In 1415, Frederick of Nuremberg, a Count of the South German House of Hohenzollern, received from the Emperor Sigismund the small and sterile Electorate of Brandenburg.

Two hundred years later (1618) Prussia, a Duchy lying northeast of Brandenburg, now known as East Prussia, was joined to Brandenburg and in 1701 Prussia, together with Brandenburg, became a Kingdom.

FREDERICK I AND FREDERICK WILLIAM I.

Frederick, the new-made King of the new-made Kingdom, whom Frederick the Great his grandson called great in small things and small in great things, incurred "the envy of the class he quitted, and the scorn of the class into which he obtruded himself."

Of Frederick William, who succeeded him, Macaulay says he was "a prince who must be allowed to have possessed some talents for administration, but whose character was disfigured by odious vices and whose eccentricities were such as had never before been seen outside of a madhouse."

He had two enthusiasms, one, economy amounting to penuriousness, the other, tall soldiers. His agents ransacked every country for tall men and in spite of his economy, in other directions, no price was thought too high to pay for them.

He picked up a seven-foot Irishman on the streets of London and paid him a larger salary than the Prussian Ambassador at St. James was receiving.

His reign is an epoch in the history of military training and his troops were the best disciplined in Europe.

FREDERICK THE GREAT.

He died in 1740 and left his Kingdom and his 90,000 soldiers to his son Frederick afterwards called The Great, whom he had abused and beaten in public; whom he had caused to be tried and convicted for desertion, because he had planned to flee from Prussia to marry; and whom he had forced to witness from the window of his cell the cruel execution of the friend who had aided him.

Frederick the Great came to the throne with an enthusiasm for French literature and the reputation of a voluptuary, but began at once to exhibit military and executive talent of a high order and the traits of a tyrant.

He had a harsh and bitter tongue, played the flute, aspired to a place in literature, and gathered around him a brilliant cosmopolitan society of free thinkers, wits, philosophers, and poets whom Voltaire kept in a continual ferment of jealousy, bickering and strife after his arrival.

Soon after Frederick became King, the Emperor of Austria died, leaving no son, and to secure to his daughter, Maria Theresa, and her descendants "the many crowns of the House of Hapsburg" he had promulgated the Pragmatic Sanction to maintain which the other Monarchs, including Frederick, had bound themselves by treaty.

But Frederick asserted a claim to Silesia, on which the statute of limitations had run for a hundred years, and without a declaration of war, proceeded to plunder a woman of her possessions in the dead of winter.

This piece of Hohenzollern rapacity started a war that spread beyond the confines of Europe and the qualities that made Frederick great shone against a background of adversity for which he himself was largely responsible.

After the peace of Aix-La-Chapelle in 1748, there was a lull for a time and Frederick applied himself to the affairs of his Kingdom, to literature and sarcastic commentaries upon his contemporaries in power, three of whom were women.

Maria Theresa plotted revenge for Silesia and enlisted the cooperation of Elizabeth of Russia who hated Frederick because she knew "her gallantries had afforded him a favorite theme for ribaldry and invective" and of Pompadour who was an obvious mark for the King's talents, as the mistress of Louis XV.

There was a shifting of alliances upon the map of Europe and the stage was set for the Seven Years' War which left to history, such names as Rossbach, Luthen, Zorndorf, and Minden, cost a million lives, and loaded every State in Europe, except Prussia, with debt.

Frederick returned to his Kingdom at last gray, furrowed with care, and bowed with bodily ills, to find the currency debased, fields uncultivated, homes destroyed, and whole villages without a living soul, but he held Silesia, participated in the first partition of Poland, and lived long enough to see with dim eyes, the beginning of the age of steam, and to send his sword to Washington, soon to be the President of a Republic destined in time to sway the balance against the transmitted Autocracy of Prussia.

Dr. McElroy of Princeton has recently extracted from the works of Frederick some expressions of his philosophy which illustrate the Prussian idea of "God's guidance," in Frederick's time and now.

Among them are these—

"There is only one person in the Kingdom—that is myself."

"If there is anything to be gained by it, we will be honest; if deception is necessary, let us be cheats."

"One takes when one can; one is wrong only when one is obliged to give back."

"Foreign alliances only in order to sow animosities."

"Do not be ashamed to make interested alliances in which you, yourself, can derive the whole advantage. Do not make the foolish mistake of not breaking them when you believe your interests require it."

At the end of the eighteenth century there were in Germany no less than 300 independent sovereignties, ecclesiastical States and Free Cities.

When serfdom ended in Germany I have not been able to ascertain, but according to DeTocqueville "at the close of the eighteenth century there was hardly any part of Germany in which serfdom was completely abolished. Generally speaking, peasants still formed part of the stock on land as they had done during the Middle Ages. Nearly all of the soldiers in the Armies of Maria Theresa and Frederick were absolute serfs."

"In 1788 the general rule with regard to German peasants was that they should not leave the seigniory and if they did, that they should be brought back by force. . . . They could not rise in their calling or change it or marry without leave from their master." DeTocqueville's "Old Regime" p. 38.

FREDERICK WILLIAM II.

Frederick the Great was succeeded in 1786 by Frederick William, his nephew.

The old Empire of Charlemagne and of Otho was on the edge of dissolution.

It was a time of strange pseudo scientific investigations. "Attempts were made to create men by chemical processes, to find the philosopher's stone that would turn everything to gold and to provide an elixir of youth."

When the French Revolution started, philosophers like Kant and Fichte defended the right of the people to change their form of Government by violence, and when the Bastile fell, Mainz, Hamburg, and some other towns put up liberty poles, but the Revolution soon got beyond philosophic theorizing.

Marie Antoinette was the sister of Leopold of Austria who induced Frederick William to join in an alliance and they met at Pillnetz and issued a declaration that they considered the affair of Louis XVI the common concern of all Sovereigns.

The reply of Leopold to the French ultimatum to renounce his plan of a European Alliance and support France started a war, the gravity of which Germany did not at first appreciate.

Louis XVI was guillotined in 1793 and Leopold died and was succeeded by Francis II, a weaker man.

On the plea that French Revolutionary ideas were taking root in Poland, Catherine II of Russia arranged a second partition of Poland, to which Austria was not invited.

Then Kosciusko led a revolt of what was left of Poland; Poland was divided a third time and this time Austria participated. Meantime the war with France had proceeded without energy.

Prussia and Austria were at odds, Prussian resources had dwindled, her zeal had burned low and she signed a treaty of peace with France at Basle which Treitschke has characterized as "An error that had to be atoned for through two decades of unparalleled misery."

Prussia stood aside now while Austria continued the war against five French armies, one of which, was commanded by Napoleon.

In October, 1797, Napoleon negotiated a treaty with Austria which Stein called "The black and complete treachery of Campo Formio," by which Austria took the dismembered Republic of Venice and France ultimately moved over to the left bank of the Rhine.

Since it was claimed that Austria had no right to convey territory of the Holy Roman Empire, a Congress of the German States was called to meet at Rastadt which sat for more than a year in an ignoble squabble among the petty German Princes whose lands were to be taken for the common enemy.

The Congress broke up in confusion, the treaty was not confirmed, and the War went on.

The second coalition was formed. Marengo and Hohenlinden brought Austria to the Peace of Lunéville (1781) by which the terms of Campo Formio were repeated.

FREDERICK WILLIAM III.

In 1797 Frederick William II died and Frederick William III, timid, ill-trained, and obstinate succeeded him.

The German States were fawningly subservient to Napoleon and the Princes who had lost possessions on the West bank of the Rhine and had fallen in with Napoleon's scheme to compensate them with ecclesiastical possessions on the East bank, flocked to Paris as suppliants.

Treitschky compares them to "a swarm of flies feasting on the bloody wounds of the Fatherland."

They compared Napoleon to Charlemagne and desired to be remembered when there should be any further lands to be divided.

Prussia "went so far as to accept for herself five times the amount of territory she had forfeited" and later remained inactive while Napoleon plundered her neighbor, Hanover.

On August 6, 1806, Francis II abdicated as Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire and it became a part of "yesterday's seven thousand years."

Prussia had "gone to sleep on the laurels of Frederick the Great" and when she finally entered the War, she entered it ill prepared.

The surviving officers of Frederick the Great had grown old and fat, the army suffered from arrogant overconfidence and at Jena and Auerstadt as Napoleon said, "the great and beautiful army of the Prussians vanished like an autumn mist before the rising of the sun."

The Rhine principalities, Saxony and Bavaria, joined the French. Napoleon entered Berlin, took down the figure of Victory from over the Brandenburg gate and stored it in a shed on the bank of the Seine.

After the Treaty of Tilsit, on a raft in the River Nieman, the humiliation of Prussia was complete but Stein, Scharnhorst, Blucher and Gneisenau not one of whom was Prussian born, lived to redeem the country.

The Revolution in Spain (1808) led men to question whether Napoleon was indeed invincible.

Stein was proscribed by Napoleon and fled to Austria with a price upon his head. But Austria was no refuge, Wagran was yet to follow, Josephine was to be put away, and Metternich was to negotiate the marriage of Napoleon and Marie Louise.

In 1811, the Czar, Alexander, having expressed the fear that the world was not big enough for both of them, Napoleon started for Moscow with 650,000 men to settle the question of space.

Stein went to Russia, after Napoleon's retreat, and entered East Prussia as the Czar's agent to rouse the Prussian people.

The wavering Prussian King joined Russia. Lützen, Dresden, Katzbach, Dannewitz, and Leipzig were fought, Napoleon was pursued to Paris, sent to Elba, and Prussia carried her figure of Victory back to Berlin.

A Congress of the powers of Europe, except Turkey, called at the moment of victory to meet at Vienna to rearrange the map of Europe which Napoleon had disarranged, was thrown into confusion, in the midst of its deliberation, by the news of Napoleon's escape from Elba and of the expulsion of Louis XVIII.

The Congress thereupon resolved that Napoleon was an outlaw and an enemy of mankind; each of the Powers agreed to furnish 150,000 men, and four great armies, under Wellington, Blucher, Schwarzenberg, and the Czar prepared to invade France.

Waterloo followed Ligny, Blucher arrived in time and the Congress of Vienna resumed its deliberations, the result of which, as to the German States, which now numbered 39, was a mere Act of Confederation providing for a Diet with no coercive power, to meet at Frankfort-on-the-Main.

"But the very weaknesses of this German confederation were to conduce to the aggrandizement of Prussia and lead to her final triumph." (Henderson Vol II p. 223.)

Meanwhile, day after day, a lonely figure looked out to sea from St. Helena.

Liberal ideas were in the air now. France was about to do away with the principle of Monarchy and her influence was spreading.

Student secret societies, the supposed ultimate object of which was the overthrow of Monarchy, spread among the German Universities.

A system of espionage and repression led to Revolutionary demonstrations.

The attention of Europe was concentrated on Prussia and Otto von Bismarck began to be known.

FREDERICK WILLIAM IV.

On the death of Frederick William III (1840) the question of a Constitution for Prussia, which had been allowed to slumber during the last years of his reign, was renewed but the new King temporized and evaded.

A Diet called in 1847, which was thought to portend a Constitution, found itself convened for the purpose of a loan for a railroad, and when the delegates spoke of the rights of the people, the King made a speech, the peroration of which became historic.

"No written sheet of paper" he said "shall ever thrust itself like a second Providence between the Lord God in Heaven and this land."

In the smaller German States the Revolution had been accomplished without bloodshed.

Petitions for Constitutions, for Trial by Jury, for the Freedom of the Press, for the right of the people to bear arms, had been granted (Henderson Vol II P/ 345).

fanned by Kossuth.

The spirit of Revolution spread to Austria where it was

In the midst of violent demonstrations, the Emperor Ferdinand was forced to grant a Constitution and Metternich joined Louis Phillippe in exile in England.

The Vienna Revolution brought on a crisis in Berlin. After a barricade war of thirty-six hours, during which he was subjected to the utmost humiliation, the King called an assembly to meet in May, but in May, the crisis having passed, he prorogued it to meet in November, and in November, it was dissolved without action, the King having announced that he would impose his own Constitution, the clauses of which were to be revised by the Representatives themselves, and, in January, 1850, the work was completed.

A reaction set in and Austria abrogated her Constitution. Meanwhile a Parliament had met at Frankfort to settle the question of a Constitution for all Germany, which, after thirteen months of discussion as to the form of Government and the terms on which Austria with her non-German dependencies should be admitted, dispersed without action.

Prussia remained neutral during the Crimean War and, in 1859, refused to join Austria in her war with France and Sardinia.

WILLIAM I.

In 1861 Frederick William IV died and was succeeded by his brother, William I then sixty years old, who had been Regent during the four years of insanity that preceded the Kings death.

In the midst of the crisis resulting from the refusal of the Prussian Parliament to grant money for the support of an enlarged army, and when the new King was contemplating abdication, Bismarck "undertook the task of ministerial government without a majority, without a budget, and without a programme." (Henderson Vol. II p. 382.)

The issue for the next four years was whether the Crown or a majority of the House of Representatives should govern Prussia, and in a historic speech, Bismarck declared that "Germany does not look to Prussia's liberalism but to her Power. . . . The great questions of the day are not decided by speeches and majority votes—therein lay the weakness of 1848 and 1849—but by blood and iron."

The differences between Austria and Prussia culminated in the war of 1866 over the Schleswig-Holstein affair which, Lord Palmerston once said only three persons ever understood, one of whom was dead, one crazy, and the other, himself, had forgotten what it was all about.

The gist of it is, as stated by Lowell, that "Bismarck persuaded Austria to join Prussia in wresting Schleswig and Holstein from Denmark and then contrived to quarrel with her about their disposition." ("The Governments of France, Italy and Germany"—p. 171.)

Then followed Königgrätz and the treaty of Prague by which the old German Confederation was to be dissolved and, in its place, two new Confederations were to be created in neither of which Austria was to have a part.

"Bismarck had originally intended to compel all the States, except Austria, to form a Federal Union, but the intervention of Napoleon III forced him to abandon the plan." (Lowell, p. 172.)

Prussia therefore annexed Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Nasau and Frankfort besides Schleswig Holstein "while with the other states north of the Main a new Federal Union was formed under the name of The North German Confederation."

"Austria was excluded from all participation in German politics; while the four States south of the Main,—Bavaria, Wurtemburg, Baden, and Hesse-Darmstadt—became independent and were expressly left at liberty to form a separate union for themselves." (Lowell, p. 173.)

Meanwhile Napoleon III had conveyed word to Bismarck that he desired to have it understood that the consent of France to Prussia's annexations presupposed a compensation to France to be determined thereafter.

The Austrian War made the King, Bismarck, Moltke, and Roon popular.

In all essential matters, Bismarck drew the Constitution of The North German Confederation and he invented the name Bundesrath for the Federal Council which was to represent the interests of the individual States. (Henderson Vol. II p. 414.)

The Reichstag was to represent the whole Confederation and be composed of members chosen on a numerical basis of one for each 100,000 of population. The President was to be the King of Prussia.

Bismarck constantly urged haste. "Set Germany in the saddle," he said, "and she will soon know how to ride."

The Constitution was adopted in less than two months and, in the fall of 1867, the first regular Diet of the North German Confederation was convened.

Napoleon III had insisted that one of the conditions of the partition of the Old Confederation should be that the South German States should be allowed to form their own union over which he hoped to exercise controlling influence, but the North and South Confederations bound themselves together by secret Treaties and commercial ties which excluded Napoleon's influence and he was delayed and baffled by Bismarck in his expectation of compensation in connection with Prussia's terms of peace with Austria.

He had demanded the left bank of the Rhine including Mainz in 1866 and gained nothing; (Henderson Vol II p. 415) he had abandoned Maximilian in Mexico; he had failed to arrange for the Luxemburg purchase; French public opinion was running against him and he desired to propitiate it by war with Germany which the French newspapers were demanding, but the immediate cause of the Franco-Prussian War was the celebrated Ems telegram.

In the fall of 1869 the throne of Spain became vacant by revolution and the news that the Spaniards had offered the throne to Prince Leopold, a Hohenzollern of remote relationship to the King of Prussia, added apprehension to hostility in France where the War Party began to talk about "a new Charles V on his double throne."

The craft of Bismarck was behind this Spanish offer which was finally rejected, but Benedetti, the French Ambassador, instructed by impatient telegrams from Paris, demanded of the King of Prussia, who was then at Ems, that he should bind himself not to give consent "if the Hohenzollerns should revert to their candidature."

This the King declined to do and caused an account of what had happened to be transmitted to Bismarck (Henderson Vol. II, p. 421) who condensed the incident into a telegram, copies of which he sent to all Consuls and Envoys in the German Capitals so worded as to fan international resentment and distrust into a blaze of open warfare.

Sedan was fought Sept. 1, 1870, 42 days after the official French Manifesto of War, July 19, and resulted in the surrender of "the largest army ever known to have been taken in the field," the capture of an Emperor, the dethronement of a Dynasty and the change of the form of Government in France from a Monarchy to a Republic.

A tumultuous assembly in Paris headed by Leon Gambetta declared Napoleon III deposed and appointed a Committee of National Defence.

Later a Provisional Government was established at Tours and negotiations for peace having failed, the siege of Paris began.

To hasten the raising of new armies for the relief of Paris, Gambetta escaped from Paris by balloon, "which had been tried with some success for reconnoitering and for sending dispatches," (Henderson Vol. II, p. 440) and reached Tours in safety. October 27 Bazain surrendered Metz.

Paris was starving in the bitter cold of winter when the armistice known as The Convention of Versailles was arranged pending which an election was held to choose an executive head of the French Republic to conduct negotiations with Germany, and Thiers was chosen.

A Treaty of Peace was finally signed at Frankfort, May 10, 1871, by which Germany gained Alsace, "a portion of Lorraine with Metz" and a war indemnity of five billion francs.

The Franco-Prussian War not only dethroned a dynasty in France and changed her boundary line, but it consolidated the German Empire and on January 1, 1871, the anniversary of the first coronation of a Prussian King, William I, King of Prussia, was crowned "German Emperor."

In 1884 Germany entered upon a policy of Colonial expansion and began to ransack the world for islands and out-lying territory.

In 1890, in a Treaty in relation to certain Zanzibar and other African apportionment of territory and influence, England committed what has been called "one of the supreme acts of folly in her diplomatic history" by surrendering to Germany The Island of Helgoland in the North Sea (Henderson Vol. II p. 474).

FREDERICK III AND WILLIAM II.

The old Emperor died March 17, 1888, and his successor, Frederick III, came to the throne a dying man, reigned three months and was succeeded by William II, who in May, 1889, wrote Bismarck "I pray God that in my difficult and responsible position as ruler, he may preserve you to me as a faithful and true advisor these many years to come" and ten months afterwards demanded his resignation.

Then he telegraphed the Grand Duke of Weimar "My heart is as heavy as though I had once more lost my grandfather, but it is the will of God and I must bear it, though it kill me. I am the officer on watch in the ship of State. The course remains the same—Full steam ahead!"

Since that time the world has become familiar with the Kaiser's identification of the will of God with his own inclinations.

At the time of Bismarck's dismissal, Punch published a cartoon by Sir John Tenniel called "Dropping the Pilot" which will be associated for all time with the incident in which the old Pilot, who had never slumbered at the helm, and had almost single handed braved the storms, was seen slowly descending the ship's side and leaving it to lesser hands.

INDUSTRIAL GERMANY.

In conformity with the tradition that each ruler should add territory to the hereditary Hohenzollern possessions, the Kaiser started early with the acquisition of Kiauchau (1898) and two Samoan Islands.

It is not good sense to minimize the strength and training of an adversary. In governmental supervision, scientific investigation, and individual training within the present generation, Germany has reached high efficiency.

Twenty-five years ago, her agricultural outlook was almost desperate, but the duty on grain which had been lowered under Caprivi was raised and scientific cultivation was encouraged until shortly before she commenced this war her "agricultural products, counting the industries directly dependent on them, such as sugar refineries, distilleries, and potato-drying establishments had a yearly value approximating twelve billion marks."

Her sugar beet production had increased from six and a half million acres in 1887 to ten millions in 1912, and her old hand labor agricultural methods had been replaced by machinery.

In 1913, she was producing 95% of her meat consumption, which had doubled since 1870. She had trebled her output of coal over that of 1886, she had trebled her tonnage of ocean-going ships, had more than doubled her railroad mileage, was producing more and better iron than any other nation in Europe, and had four thousand public electric plants supplying 17,500 communities with electricity.

She had great chemical plants, with libraries and laboratories, great institutions of technology, great trade schools, and "industrial continuation schools."

SOCIAL SCIENCE AND MENTAL SUGGESTION.

Nowhere had social science been more thoroughly applied. Human beings were under governmental guidance from birth to death as material for the use of the State.

There were Elementary Schools for normal children, Aid Schools for mentally defective children, Observation Stations for physically defective children, "Middle Schools" for those of moderate means, and Gymnasia for the well-to-do where the classics were taught.

Germany's autocracy reached down through all professions, through all industries, through all grades of society, controlled the people in their occupations, recreations, and social relations, and by operation of the laws of mental suggestion and thought transference, controlled their thinking.

Most men never originate anything, but most men think they think what some one else has stolen from some one else and said or written. Prussianism understands this.

Under German autocracy, her philosophers, teachers, preachers, military writers, newspapers and periodicals have loaded the waves of thought with claims of German greatness, superior rights, divine direction, and the glory of war.

Her constitution was framed to create and foster a powerful military state, whose social and industrial organization should be the shaft behind the spear-point.

The power of Prussia is the power of a hereditary, military despotism, which has trained the minds and bodies of its subjects to use the tools of industry and of war precisely as directed.

THE GOVERNMENT.

The German Empire was founded by Princes, not by the people. The constitution gives power to the Emperor and the shadow of it to the people.

Treitschke declared that "the conditions are such that the will of the Empire can in the last instance be nothing else than the will of the Prussian state." (Treitschke's "Political Thoughts" pp. 104–106) and the will of the Prussian state is the will of the Emperor.

In 1888, when the Crown Prince Frederick took the throne, Bismarck made it a condition of his continuance as Chancellor that there should be "no parliamentary government." (Bismarck's "Reflections and Reminiscences," Vol. 2, p. 330). And the condition of "no Parliamentary Government" has existed from the beginning of the Empire.

The Empire consists of 23 states, 3 Free Cities, and 1 Imperial Territory, Alsace-Lorraine.

In the language of the constitution "the presidency of the Union belongs to the King of Prussia, who bears the title of German Emperor."

"His functions as Emperor and as King are indeed so interwoven that it is very difficult to distinguish them. As Emperor, he has supreme command of the Army, and appoints the highest officers. As King of Prussia, he appoints the lower officers and has the general management of the troops over most of Germany."

"As Emperor, he instructs the Chancellor to prepare a bill. As King, he instructs him to introduce it into the Bundesrath and directs how one-third of the votes of that body shall be cast."

"Then the bill is laid before the Reichstag in his name as Emperor, and as King he directs the Chancellor what amendments to accept on behalf of the Bundesrath, or rather on behalf of the Prussian delegation there." (Lowell, p. 208.)

THE POWER OF PRUSSIA.

1. Prussia has a veto on all changes of the constitution. She has 17 votes in the Bundesrath, and 14 are enough. (Const., Art. 78) Lowell, 178.

2. She has a veto on all changes in the Army, the Navy, and the taxes. (Arts. 5–35–37.) Lowell, 179.

3. She has the casting vote in case of a tie in the Bundesrath. (Art. 7)

4. She has the Chairmanship of all the standing committees of the Bundesrath, except one, Foreign Affairs, the Chairmanship of which would be of no use to her. (Art. 8.) Lowell 179.

5. She has 235 out of 397 votes in the Reichstag. Lowell 185.

THE CHANCELLOR.

There is no Imperial Cabinet, and the only Federal Minister is the Chancellor, who has subordinates, but no colleagues. Lowell, 208.

1. The constitution declares that the Emperor, who is always King of Prussia, shall appoint the Chancellor, who presides over the Bundesrath and arranges its business. Through his hands, "all communications from the Reichstag and all motions and petitions must pass."

2. The Chancellor is always one of the Prussian delegates to the Bundesrath. Lowell, 197, footnote 2.

THE BUNDESRATH.

1. The Bundesrath is composed of delegates appointed by the Princes of the States and the Senates of the Free Cities. (Arts. 6–10.)

Since 1879, Alsace-Lorraine has been permitted to send three delegates who can debate, but not vote. Lowell, 191.

2. The Bundesrath has 58 members, of whom Prussia sends 17; Bavaria, 6; Saxony, 4; Wurtemberg, 4; Baden, 3; Hesse, 3; Brunswick, 2; Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 2; and the remaining 14 States and three Free Cities have 1 each. Lowell, 192.

Prussia actually has 20 votes, because the King bought out the governmental rights of the little principality of Waldeck, including its one vote in the Bundesrath, and because in 1884, he excluded the Duke of Cumberland from the succession in Brunswick and caused a Prussian Prince to be appointed perpetual regent in his place, thereby gaining two other votes.

3. All the delegates of a State are required to vote alike. Their votes are the votes of their State, cast by instruction of their State, and whether they all vote or not, all the votes belonging to a State are counted. The constitution provides that uninstructed votes shall not be counted. (Art. 7.) Lowell, 194.

"The true conception of the Bundesrath is that of an assembly of the Sovereigns of the States who are not indeed actually present, but appear in the persons of their representatives." Lowell, 197.

4. Every law requires the assent of the Bundesrath. "It has the first and last word on almost all the laws * * * and by far the larger part of the statutes, as well as the budget, are first discussed by the Bundesrath. They are then sent to the Reichstag, and if passed by that body, are again submitted to the Bundesrath for approval before they are promulgated by the Emperor." Lowell, 200.

5. Of 7 out of the 8 standing committees of the Bundesrath created by the Constitution, a Prussian member must always be chairman, and the Emperor appoints all the members of the Committees on the Army and Fortresses, and of the Committee on Maritime Affairs. (Lowell, 198.)

6. It has extensive powers of a judicial and semijudicial nature.

7. It can dissolve the Reichstag at any time, with the consent of the Emperor.

THE REICHSTAG.

1. The Reichstag has 397 members, elected for five years by secret ballot of electors who must have reached the age of 25 years. They are chosen from electoral districts created more than 20 years ago on the basis of 100,000 population to a district, and by reason of the growth of population in large cities, these districts have become unequal.

For illustration, Berlin has a population of two and a half millions and is represented by only six members, but Berlin and other large cities send radical members and reapportionment has been purposely delayed. (Lowell, 184–185.)

2. The members of the Reichstag served without pay down to 1906, when the Bundesrath permitted a salary of 3,000 marks a year (about $750).

"The object of withholding pay from the members is, of course, to prevent the power of the poorer classes from becoming too great." Lowell, 189.

3. The Reichstag "can not be said to direct the policy of the State either in legislation or administration." Lowell, 189.

4. Its influence is further reduced by the fact that it can be dissolved at any time by the Bundesrath with the consent of the Emperor.

THE ARMY AND NAVY.

The Constitution provides that the military laws shall be made by the Empire.

2. That the military forces shall be a single Army under the command of the Emperor, whose orders they are bound to obey. (Lowell, 180.)

3. It gives the Emperor the right to inspect and dispose of the troops and to appoint all officers whose commands include the entire contingent of a State. Lowell, 180.

4. It provides also that the selection of Generals shall be subject to his approval.

5. The contingents of the States are recruited, drilled, and commanded by Prussia, and form an integral part of her Army. Lowell, 180.

6. The Army and the Navy are the instruments of Prussian autocracy. All German troops are bound to render unconditional obedience to the Emperor and "if in any part of the Federal territory the public safety is threatened," he has power to declare that such a condition exists, whereupon civil authority is at once subordinated to martial law and the Emperor becomes the Military Dictator. (Art. 68.)

THE EMPEROR.

Here are the Emperor's views concerning his power:

1. "The King holds his power by the grace of God, to whom alone he is responsible."

2. "There is only one master in this country. That am I. Who opposes me I shall crush to pieces."

3. "There is only one law—my law—the law which I myself lay down."

4. "The soldier must not have a will of his own; they must all have only one will and that will mine."

5. "It may come to this—that I command you to shoot down your own relatives, brothers, and even parents, in the streets, which God forbid; but then you must obey my orders without a murmur."

Whether we call this megalomania or mediaevalism projected into the twentieth century, it is becoming more and more evident that the world will never again permit any one man to exercise the despotic power which this Kaiser wields. [Applause.]

"AN INCREMENT OF TERRITORY."

The Prussian lust of power was not satisfied by the domination of Germany.

Speaking of the Schleswig-Holstein affair in his "Reflections and Reminiscences" Bismarck says: "I reminded the King (William I) that every one of his immediate ancestors, not even excepting his brother, had won an increment of territory for the State; Frederick William IV had acquired Hohenzollern and the Jahde district; Frederick II, the Rhine Province; Frederick William II, Poland; Frederick II, Silesia; Frederick William I, old Hither Pomerania; The Great Elector, further Pomerania and Magdeburg, Minden, etc.; and I encouraged him to do likewise." (Vol. II, p. 39.)

Autocracy with the Army as its instrument, Autocracy with the Press as its servant, to teach the people to believe in a State which makes its own morality, unfettered by its own promises, whose sworn oaths are perjuries, whose diplomacy is duplicity, a State devoted to the policy of gaining "an increment of territory" in every reign—that is Prussia.

And this Hohenzollern King with inherited cumulative rapacity, armed with the most gigantic military weapon in history, armed with twentieth century scientific instruments for killing, armed with all the outlawed barbarisms of brute force, bent on an "increment of territory," invaded Belgium, admitting by his Chancellor that his invasion was "contrary to the dictates of international law," and he has since continuously committed crimes which the world can never forget nor forgive.

And what is this "increment of territory" that this last Hohenzollern dreamed of? Not Belgium alone, not France alone, not Mittle Europa alone, but Pan Germany and world power.

Not only did he propose to cut the map of Europe to his own pattern, but to extend his power beyond seas.

At Damascus in 1898 he told his audience that "the 300,000,000 Mohammedans who lived scattered over the Globe may be assured of this, that the German Emperor will be their friend at all times" and on July 3, 1900, he declared "neither on the ocean nor across it, can any great decision be again arrived at, without Germany and the German Emperor."

THE PAN-GERMAN PLAN.

The ultimate object of the Pan-German plan was the domination of territory from the Baltic Sea to the Persian Gulf.

In 1914 Prussia governed the German Empire. Three years later, by consent or by force, it had extended its dominion to territory occupied by 176,000,000 people as estimated by André Chéradame in his "Pan-Germany."

"The result" he says "has permitted the German General Staff to take over at will certain strategic points or regions of the greatest influence before the war. Zeebrugge on the North Sea, for instance; Trieste, Pola, and Cattaro on the Aegean; The Ottoman Straits; The Turkish, Bulgarian, and Roumanian shores of the Black Sea have always been strategic points or districts of exceptional value.

"This value, however, has become vastly greater, now that these points or districts form a part of a single military system under the directing and organizing power of the Berlin General Staff.

"At present (1918) these essential strategic points and districts are the stronghold of the Pan-German frontiers. * * * The internal military organization of Pan-Germany is being carried forward with uninterrupted speed.

"Factories of war material have been judiciously distributed throughout the whole territory with the double object of utilizing raw materials near their source of origin, thus avoiding useless transportation and of making possible the swift dispatch of munitions to any threatened sector of front.

"For this reason, the Krupp Firm at the outbreak of the War established important branch factories, not only in Bavaria, but also in Bulgaria and Turkey." (Chéradame p. 36.)

This Pan-Germany is composed first, of the territory taken from France, Belgium, Russia, Serbia, and Roumania; second, of the Vassal Nations of Austria Hungary Bulgaria and Turkey, but it holds within itself the potential elements of its own dissolution.

Without Austria Hungary there can be no Mittle Europa; without Mittle Europa there can be no Pan-Germany and Cheradame estimates that in the middle of Mittle Europa there are 55,000,000 Polish Lithuanians, Ruthenians, Czecks, Jugo Slavs and Roumanians, who are hostile to Germany and would join the Allies if they had opportunity.

Thousands of these people surrendered to the Russians and to the Serbians to fight against Germany and Austria and thousands of them, who have found homes in America, are now fighting under the Stars and Stripes.

INFAMY ERECTED INTO A RELIGION.

It is four years now since Germany began to sear the face of Belgium and France and the world has grown familiar with the Prussian doctrine that might makes right; that military weakness is a sin; that a Nation makes its own morality; that a treaty is of no binding force after it ceases to be of advantage; that the Kaiser is not bound by the moral obligations of other men, and that he rules by Divine Right over a people chosen of God whose duty it is to impose their civilization upon other nations.

It is four years now since the world began to realize with horror and amazement that a Nation, claiming for itself the highest civilization, could in the execution of a set purpose to enlarge its power, enter deliberately upon a "campaign of frightfulness" involving not only the violation of its treaty obligations, the violation of the law of Nations and the laws of civilized warfare, but the violation of every moral law and, at the same time, claim the inspiration and guidance of God.

It is four years now since Germany invaded Belgium and began to inflict death and torment by the use of poison gas, to murder and maim women and little children, to destroy undefended towns, to drop bombs on hospitals, to murder men, women, and children of neutral nations at sea, to outrage women and to burn noncombatant men, women, and children alive in the flames of their burning homes, under the pretense of a defensive war waged under God's guidance.

Nursed on its own foreordination to conquest, reared and trained in an atmosphere of its own infallibility, educated by a literature glorifying arms, the mailed fist, brute force, and the disregard of moral obligations, Germany deliberately entered upon a war of spoliation and conquest, and measured by the map, Hohenzollern Imperialism has occupied a large "increment of territory."

MAP MAKING.

But outside this black belt of German despotism, widened and lengthened by intrigue, and unspeakable cruelty, the civilized world is in alliance either formal or informal, and a reconstructed map of the Universe is slowly taking shape in human aspiration for better things.

Government, like all man-made material things, is first an invisible thing which takes shape in human thought and is afterwards made manifest in capitals, courts, and legislative bodies.

The old order is passing away—being shot away.

The foundations of things supposed to be permanent are being broken up.

It is difficult to lay premises from which to reason into the future, but when this war is over the changes in geography will not be as great as the changes in social and economic conditions.

The issues involved in this war are the principles upon which human society rests.

We used to bound America on the East by the Atlantic Ocean. It is bounded on the East now by the Hindenburg line.

On the other side of that line, the fundamental principle is to make each man a part of a military establishment, organized to perpetuate a few in power and to plunder and despoil its weaker neighbors.

On this side, we fight for the liberties of the civilized world; the sanctity of treaties; the law of Nations and the honor of womanhood. [Applause.]

On this side, it is not one man who controls, it is not one nation, it is not even one race; it is the spirit of Democracy.

It has never entered into the political philosophy of any American citizen to be a mere instrument for the aggrandizement of any man or set of men.

Every nerve of America is strung with one purpose now. We will talk about terms of peace after our immediate business is finished. [Applause.]

The men of France and Belgium whose women have been outraged, whose children have been impaled on German bayonets, whose homes have been desolated, and the men of England, knowing what Germany intended to do to England, if she could cross the narrow channel and set foot on English soil, will want to make the terms short and the conference short—and the terms ought to be the terms of Grant at Donnelson, "unconditional surrender." [Applause.]

We Americans realize now that what we thought secure—our Constitution, our Government by the people, our Monroe Doctrine, our homes, our families, and our property—might have been swept into the horrible wake of barbaric plunder, devastation, and outrage.

Shortly before his death, Captain Knyvett, of the Australian Intelligence and Scouting Service, contributed an article to the Outlook in which he said: "We are fighting for ourselves in our own defense for every Australian knows that it is in France that Australian home defense is being secured." This also applies to America.

In answer to a French woman's words of thanks that Australians had come to fight for the women of France, he said "M'selle, we did not come here to fight for you; we came here to fight for our own women folk for we know that though you live next door to these brutes, we live in the same street and after they have done with you, it would be our turn and the turn of our women folk if we did not come and fight the fight of Australia's home defense here on French soil." This also applies to America.

On April 12, Marshal Haig issued an order to "all ranks of the British Army in France and Flanders" in which he said: "Every position must be held to the last man. There must be no retreat. With our backs to the wall, and believing in the justice of our cause, each of us must fight to the end. The safety of our homes and the freedom of mankind depend alike upon the conduct of each one of us at this critical moment."

And they stood fast with the blue of the English Channel behind them and the homes of England beyond.

Our boys are there now. We are under way now. We have geared the power of this Nation to the business of war now. And the man who obstructs or delays now will be despised as long as men read history. [Applause.] The thrifty soul who sees only a chance to make money, the politician who gets himself associated with war news for advertising purposes, the patriot who plays safe, will find his place in public estimation.

The issue is even greater than democracy against autocracy. It is Right against Wrong. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER].

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak upon the record of North Dakota in the war.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield whatever time is necessary for Mr. BAER to finish his address.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, as we turn our eyes toward Old Glory, the emblem of the greatest Nation in the world, we behold 48 stars, each star representing one of the States in the Union. These States are not necessarily striving to excel each other in their patriotic endeavor. We are a united Nation. It is a united endeavor. To-day we see the sons of the men who wore the gray marching side by side with the sons of the men who wore the blue, fighting for the cause of freedom and justice, each vying with the other to exalt the name above all names—an American citizen. We have met, East and West, in the closest union. We have obliterated class feelings as such and welded our country into the most militant fighting force for democracy the world has ever seen.

In my remarks I shall not attempt to emphasize superiority for my own State in the matter of patriotic effort. I simply wish to show that she is in step with her sister States for the one great purpose of bringing this war to a speedy and successful issue. We want to win the war and win it quickly.

I believe all Congressmen will agree that the pride one has in the achievements of his own State is quite pardonable, especially when it has been intentionally or unintentionally misrepresented. North Dakota stands second to none in its response to every call of our beloved country. She needs no defense.

Many believe North Dakota did not subscribe its full quota to the first liberty loan, when as a matter of fact the subscriptions more than doubled her quota. In the second liberty loan we oversubscribed 70 per cent, which I understand is the highest for any State in the Union. We also have more members of the Red Cross, in proportion to our population, than any other State in this country. Again, the patriotic citizens of both city and country exerted the utmost energy in carrying on the Red Cross campaigns, the campaigns for religious organizations connected with the war, thrift stamps, savings stamps, and all the other war activities. Numerous public-spirited speakers and "four-minute men" have also done their bit for democracy. Members of the legislature and State officials have aided in this great work.

I believe, when the history of the war is written, the reader will find that the loyal citizens in the cities and in the rural districts of North Dakota have done their full share.

WAR RECORD OF NORTH DAKOTA.

The record of North Dakota in aiding and assisting our Government in the prosecution of this great war for democracy has truly been a record of loyal service.

VOLUNTEERS.

North Dakota has sent two volunteer regiments of as splendid men, morally and physically, as ever donned a khaki uniform. In the total number of volunteers, including the National Guard, the Regular Army, the Navy, and the Marines, North Dakota has not fallen below the average for the United States, and this in spite of the fact the Government has constantly pointed out that "soldiers of the soil" are as essential as the soldiers in the trenches.

THE SELECTIVE DRAFT.

When our Government asked for and enacted the selective-service draft law, North Dakota acquiesced and responded readily and without murmur or complaint.

Immediately North Dakota, peopled with a population consisting of farmers to the extent of about 85 per cent, set about to organize its draft boards, and the supplemental auxiliary agencies in aid thereof, in accordance with the regulation and request of the War Department and Provost Marshal General Crowder.

Gov. Frazier, with the active assistance of Attorney General Langer, and with the cooperation and advice of H. A. Bronson, vice president of the American Bar Association for North Dakota; F. T. Cuthbert, president of the State Bar Association; and Andrew A. Bruce, chief justice of the supreme court, immediately set to work to organize the various agencies in the State for full cooperation in order that the selective-draft law in the State might be made effective at a minimum cost.

North Dakota is proud of its record in response to the selective-draft law. The report of Gen. Crowder reveals that in the operation of this part of the selective-service law North Dakota leads the States of the Union in the minimum cost per certified draft man. The record for North Dakota is $1.83 per soldier as against an average of $4.23 for all of the States in our Union.

This record alone speaks volumes for the loyal devotion and ready response of our people to render every aid to our Government and at the minimum cost.

WHEAT CONSCRIPTION.

When our Government asked that wheat for our country and our allies be taken at a governmental fixed price of $2.20 per bushel, and at a time when such wheat was actually worth in the open market over a dollar per bushel more than such fixed price, the farmers of North Dakota, without murmur or complaint, and without sending delegations to Washington to protest, loyally and willingly accepted and received the price so fixed for their wheat and delivered the same to our Nation.

COAL CONSERVATION—PRODUCTION.

Under the able fuel administrator, Capt. I. P. Baker, North Dakota has carried on an efficient campaign for fuel conservation by encouraging the use and development of the coal resources of our own State. In many households and public buildings lignite coal has been used exclusively. This not only encourages the use of our inexhaustible supply of lignite but also relieves the Government from the necessity of shipping coal from eastern points.

LIBERTY LOANS.

Whenever our Government has asked for financial support for our liberty loans, North Dakota, even though impoverished in parts of the State by severe crop losses in the years 1916 and 1917, nevertheless has gone over the top upon every request with magnificent oversubscriptions beyond the allotted quotas, and all this in the face of the fact that such moneys so subscribed pass beyond the borders of the State and are not returned to the State, except as crop production may cause the same to return. For in the State of North Dakota there are no manufacturing industries engaged in war activities, no war manufacturing establishments, and no Army cantonments. Hon. Wesley McDowell is chairman of the liberty loan campaign and has rendered excellent service.

In the first liberty loan the allotted quota for North Dakota was $1,500,000; the subscription was $3,600,000. In the second liberty loan the quota was $6,000,000; the subscription was $10,238,000. In the third liberty loan the quota was $6,500,000, and the subscription was $11,244,000. Furthermore, North Dakota, in the third liberty-loan drive, with Montana, were the first States in the Union to complete their quotas.

RED CROSS.

In active support of the Red Cross, North Dakota has continuously set a record of high devotion and worthy achievement.

In support of the Red Cross magazines, North Dakota leads the entire United States for magazines received monthly per capita of population. Hon. N. C. Young, of Fargo, is the director for our State and has supervised this splendid work.

In the second Red Cross drive, North Dakota leads the States of the Union with an oversubscription of 250 per cent. Furthermore, throughout the State, here and there and everywhere, Red Cross acres may be found donated by farmers.

To illustrate this loyalty of service by one example: A landowner of the State possessed of 320 acres of good virgin soil agreed to donate the same to the Red Cross for two years. Through a member of the State council of defense tractors were secured, labor was furnished, and seed promised. This land so donated by one landowner will be devoted in its crop production for two seasons to the Red Cross, with the added provision that if there be a crop failure in either of these two years it may be used for an additional year for the Red Cross. Many other instances could be cited.

INCREASED FOOD PRODUCTION.

When again our Government requested that every effort be made to increase our crop production in the United States to aid and maintain our boys and our allies at the front, North Dakota again, upon its own initiative, willingly and immediately took action to insure as greatly increased acreage as possible in this State.

Gov. Frazier, realizing that the crop failures in the years 1916 and 1917 in various parts of the State had not only greatly impoverished the farmers, but in many counties of the State had left them without the seed necessary for a succeeding crop and without the money or the credit necessary to obtain the same, unless the State should in some manner render aid and assistance, as a patriotic endeavor called into special session the legislature and proposed that such legislature enact a seed-and-feed act for the benefit of the farmers, so as to enable needy farmers to borrow and secure sufficient seed and feed for purposes of crop production in the year 1918.

This act was adopted unanimously, practically as proposed, without regard to political affiliations. This measure was similar to one introduced by me here, known as the Baer bill, which passed this House by an overwhelming vote of 250 to 67.

And may I call attention here to the fact that the national administration has given substantial effect to the proposals of my measure through the granting of loans to needy farmers out of the $5,000,000 appropriation? This money is being loaned to farmers through the agency of the Federal land banks. Six hundred thousand dollars has been assigned to North Dakota to use, if necessary. I am glad to say that my own district has had a record crop and will not require Federal aid.

John N. Hagen, the commissioner of agriculture and labor in North Dakota, put into force and operation this seed-and-feed act.

Here are some of the results of the operation of this act:

There are 53 counties in the State; 26 counties made application either to bond or to issue warrants for the purpose of securing seed and feed to sell to the farmers of the State upon their notes to be given for the cost of the same, including interest.

These counties authorized the issue of either bonds or warrants in the sum of $3,435,000; the bonds so issued were sold upon the open market by Commissioner Hagen at the rate of 4 per cent.

What is North Dakota's record as a result of the efforts of the State administration in this regard?

I call your attention to the crop report statistics of the Secretary of Agriculture. They are herewith stated for three years, the 1918 report being taken from the August, 1918, bulletin for the monthly crop report:

Crop acreages in North Dakota.
[Compiled from Federal reports.]

Crop.	1916	1917	1918
Wheat	7,150,000	7,000,000	7,630,000
Oats	2,500,000	2,575,000	2,520,000
Barley	1,725,000	1,825,000	1,700,000
Flax	790,000	965,000	955,000
Rye	450,000	1,040,000	2,038,000
Corn	510,000	590,000	484,000
Potatoes	75,000	90,000	90,000
Total acreage	13,200,000	14,085,000	15,417,000

An increase of over 2,200,000 acres over 1916, an average year.

Crop production in North Dakota.

	1916	1917	1918, estimated.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
Wheat	39,325,000	56,000,000	83,548,000
Oats	53,750,000	38,625,000	62,721,000
Barley	26,738,000	22,812,000	35,280,000
Flax	8,135,000	3,764,000	7,922,000
Rye	5,985,000	4,200,000	21,399,000
Corn	13,515,000	5,310,000	11,926,000
Potatoes	6,975,000	3,870,000	9,004,000

Wheat production increased over 50 per cent according to these statistics.

These statistics speak volumes concerning the patriotism of the farmers of North Dakota and the splendid leadership of the State administration.

It should be noticed that the increased acreage is for those cereals used in food for human consumption. In other words, the farmers raised the crops which our Government requested.

FLAX PRODUCTION.

Again, when our Government requested that as much flax as possible be produced this year for governmental needs North Dakota quickly, loyally, and willing responded.

There are thousands of acres of land in our State vacant, tillable, idle, and unproductive. Many of these acres are owned by nonresidents; many by speculators who have been holding these lands as an investment for the natural increment in land values that has occurred and will occur as surrounding lands are peopled by actual farmers, broken up, and made productive.

In North Dakota this same special session of the legislature created an act granting to the governor of the State the authority to appoint the members of a State council of defense, of which the governor should be chairman, and granting to such council of defense broad powers to aid and assist our Government in the prosecution of this war and to protect the families and property of our soldier boys who have gone to the front. This council of defense has taken a noteworthy and advanced step to aid and assist our Government in crop production. Thomas Allen Box is the secretary and an active worker.

It enacted a regulatory order providing that any farmer of our State, upon a showing being made that there were idle, vacant, and tillable lands in the State which he could utilize for crop production for purposes of aiding our Government, could secure a permit of such council of defense to enter upon the same and make them productive for the year 1918 for raising flax and for the year 1919 for raising wheat, providing he would carefully farm the same and had the ability so to do, and providing, further, proper compensation to the owner of the land for its use.

This act has worked out successfully and beyond the hopes of the most sanguine. From every part of the State the willing and loyal hands of the farmers went to work to add to the acreage of North Dakota what had been idle and vacant lands. Some complaints have come from landowners and speculators who desired rather to hold slacker acres and virgin prairie than to make the same productive. Threats have been made of the exercise of unlawful powers by the council of defense, but it has been only as a murmur as against the sounding waves of an incoming tide of patriotic approval. Three hundred thousand of these idle acres have been added to the productive acreage of North Dakota.

SOLDIERS' MORATORIUM.

Furthermore, this same special session of the legislature enacted a moratorium act for the benefit of our soldier boys who are in the service, prohibiting the foreclosure of liens or mortgages upon soldiers' property during the period of war, except under necessary circumstances. It also passed an act giving to our men in the service the right to vote whether here or abroad.

Under its broad powers granted the burden has been placed upon our State council of defense to protect the property and the dependents of our military men in the service of our Government.

Well and promptly has it acted in seeing that our men in the service of our Government and fighting for the principles of democracy abroad should be protected and safeguarded here both as to their dependents and their property.

Mortgagees here and there in the State have been made to feel the exercise of the broad powers of this council prohibiting acts not only contrary to the moratorium act but acts that would or might serve to embarrass our soldier boys or their dependent wives.

And, again, when complaints began to come to this council of defense that the greedy desires of some men were impelling them in certain cases to proceed to take farm machinery and farm instrumentalities necessary now to harvest the present crop under liens and chattel mortgages upon the same, this council, in a patriotic endeavor to do everything possible to insure the largest crop production, prescribed that during the harvesting and thrashing season foreclosures upon such farm machinery should not be had, and this moratorium act is being enforced and being obeyed.

WORK OR FIGHT.

And this same council of defense, to conserve our man power and to increase crop production, further decreed that all male persons between the ages of 18 and 50 years of age be usefully employed, thus supplementing the orders and regulations of our War Department through Provost Marshal General Crowder.

And to further set the example of loyalty at this time when every ounce of human energy and power should be directed in aid and assistance of our Government in the prosecution of this war, the governor of the State has requested all State employees able so to do to devote their time as far as possible and their vacation in actual work in assisting the harvesting and thrashing of the present crops, and for some time past he and other State employees have been found in the harvest fields doing actual work and service in the garnering of the present crop in North Dakota, doing what they can to make every resource of our State available for our Government in this great war.

Business men, professional men, and others residing in the cities volunteered their services to help harvest the bumper crop in North Dakota. Many gave all their time. Business men closed their stores at 4 o'clock and went out into the fields and worked until dark helping the farmers. I have a photograph in my office of a wagon load of huskies leaving Fargo to do the work of the farm hands in the field. There is an aroused feeling of patriotism throughout the State which I have not seen manifested in any other part of the country which I have visited.

WOMEN'S ACTIVITIES.

In conclusion I am proud to pay tribute to the magnificent example of patriotism of our North Dakota women in their efforts to win the war. They have, without murmur, met the added responsibilities and successfully carried forward the Red Cross and the many activities growing out of the war. Without complaint they have carried out the regulations of food conservation in their households. Dr. E. F. Ladd, president of the agricultural college and also food administrator for North Dakota, has done excellent work along the lines of conservation of foodstuffs and he had the hearty cooperation of every housewife. The women have gone about this work with hearts saddened by the absence of loved ones that may never return and in the face of conditions requiring as great courage as those who have gone to the front.

With all her sister States, North Dakota has heard from across the waters the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us," and has nobly and courageously responded by first giving the best of her young manhood and then unstintingly of her means. I am confident she will continue to meet every call made upon her in the same loyal manner in the future as in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12863 and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. GILLETT. That will be just for general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 12, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SINNOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3225) to reserve as a part of the Oregon National Forest certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. against the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 776), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

Wilcox, vice president of the Merchants-Mechanics Bank of Baltimore, Md., against the high taxes in new revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: Petition of citizens of the ninth congressional district of Ohio, against the passage of the discriminatory war tax on automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 12, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock and was called to order by the Clerk of the House.

The CLERK. The Clerk will read a letter from the Speaker of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 11, 1918.

Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House:

I hereby designate Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore for Thursday, September 12.

Yours, respectfully, CHAMP CLARK, Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Unto Thee, O God, our Heavenly Father, do we lift up our hearts in gratitude and praise for Thy goodness and for Thy wonderful works unto the children of men.

Especially do we bless Thee for a Government of the people, by the people, for the people. Continue Thy favors unto us, our arms and those of our allies in the progress they are making, until a permanent peace shall be established; that all nations shall enjoy freedom, liberty, justice, equal rights for all.

We thank Thee that two thousand eight hundred of our soldiers were saved from a watery grave by the ingenuity and skill of our sailors in sinking the dastardly U-boat.

Hear our prayer in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4886. An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the original town site of Port Angeles, Wash.;

S. 4855. An act to amend an act approved April 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes"; and

S. 4889. An act to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 8004. An act authorizing the resurvey or retracement of lands heretofore returned as surveyed public lands of the United States under certain conditions.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. POINDEXTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4889. An act to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

S. 4855. An act to amend an act approved April 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

S. 4886. An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the original town site of Port Angeles, Wash.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 12863, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] if he has anyone to go on now?

Mr. FORDNEY. I thought Mr. LONDON was going to talk.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to yield him 30 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. WOOD of Indiana is here, and I would just as soon go on, but I want somebody to hear him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee] having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 220 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented the list of absentees to be entered in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

STATUS OF MEMBERS UNDER THE SELECTIVE DRAFT.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk certain short correspondence with the Provost Marshal General concerning the status of Members of Congress who are within the age of the selective draft.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have the correspondence indicated read from the Clerk's desk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 5, 1918.

Maj. Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
Provost Marshal General, War Department,
Seventh and E Streets, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Supplementing my privileged personal call upon you of to-day, I respectfully request that as a matter of public importance you advise me of the ruling of your department in interpretation of the langauge of section 4 of House bill 3545, as approved May 18, 1917, and as amended, viz:

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States; the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia; regular or duly ordained ministers of religion; students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools; and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed," etc., in so far as whether a duly elected, qualified, and acting Member of the Congress of the United States between the ages of 18 and 45 years, inclusive, may make waiver of the fact that he is such Member of Congress.

It has been my intention, upon my registration for selective military service, as required by the provisions of House bill 3545, as amended, to make no claim for exemption because of my being a Member of Congress and to waive such if it be classed as an exemption.

Very truly,

WARREN GARD,
Representative in Congress from Third Congressional District of Ohio.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1918.

Hon. WARREN GARD, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GARD: I have your letter of September 5, 1918, requesting a ruling in interpretation of the language of section 4 of the selective-service law, relating to the exemption of a Member of Congress of the United States. Your specific inquiry is: "May a duly elected, qualified, and acting Member of Congress of the United States, between the ages of 18 and 45 years, inclusive, make waiver of the fact that he is such Member of Congress?"

In my opinion a Member of Congress may not make "waiver" of the fact that he is such Member of Congress, because by the law itself he is "exempt from the selective draft here provided"; therefore, during the continuance of that status, he is under no responsibility whatever to serve in the military forces of the United States; and, this being true, there can arise with respect to him no right or privilege of exclusion pertaining to such liability to which such waiver could attach.

This exemption, provided by the act, is obviously a statutory exemption; it is, as it is submitted, a relief from the liability to service which the statute imposes (except as the statute itself may modify the exemption), as distinguished from the exclusion from service provided for by the act as to one who is primarily liable.

The statute contains no modification of the exemption, as it applies to persons falling within the class discussed above; as to those the exemption is peremptory, absolute, and fully operative. Since, therefore, the statute imposes on persons belonging to this class no liability whatever for service, such persons can no more waive their exemption from liability than a boy under 18 or a man over 45 can waive his exemption, or a woman can waive hers, and all because such persons have no liability to service to which such an exemption waiver could attach.

Therefore, a Member of Congress, within or without draft ages, can make no waiver.

There are obvious, sound, and indispensable constitutional grounds and considerations for this absolute, statutory exemption from liability to military service, of all legislative and judicial officers of the Federal Government, and of all legislative, executive, and judicial officers of the State government. Without amplifying the argument and taking as illustrative of all a Member of Congress, it is to be noted that if the Member of Congress might waive (in the proper sense) his exemption, he could be inducted into the military service, whereupon either he would ipso facto cease to be a legislative officer, which his constituency might not wish, and which might result in depriving the Nation of a wise counselor; or he would retain his legislative office and also his military status, which would result in placing him completely under the control of the Commander in Chief—a situation pregnant with potentialities wholly destructive of free Government.

A Member of Congress may, of course, resign his office and, if and when he does, his exemption, if he is within the draft ages, automatically ceases, his liability to service at once accrues, and he then takes his place among all other persons of like liability, and becomes subject to the same exemption (discussed under (b) supra) and exclusion rules and, after entering the service, to the same rules of discharge that govern all other persons of like status within the draft ages.

Very truly yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Provost Marshal General.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the Labor Day message of the President of the United States issued on Labor Day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, has not that been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. EVANS. I think not. I asked the Clerk and he told me it had not.

Mr. GILLETT. If it has not been printed, I shall not make any objection, but if it has I shall object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, that is not a proper request to make of the Committee of the Whole, and I shall object temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objects.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are living at the most critical time in the history of the world, and there never was a time when complete unity of purpose and concerted action were as necessary on the part of the American people as now. We are facing upon the battle fields of Europe the most desperate, the most tyrannical, the most brutal and barbarous monarch that ever appeared upon the earth. [Applause.]

All that we hold dear is involved and the very life of our Nation is at stake. Human liberty everywhere is in the balance. More now than to any other government the free peoples of the earth look to America and to Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States. [Applause.] American boys in uniform and following the flag of our country are dying for our liberties and for humanity on the battle fields of Europe.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that there has been sounded at this distressing and critical time a discordant note by a Member of this body. But it has been done by the Republican gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] and a Republican in another body in this city. They have undertaken to discredit and destroy in the estimation of the American people the great man who leads our forces at this hour. It has been the custom of the Republican side for some two or three campaigns to have their keynote speech made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG]. I recall his savage attack upon the President at the beginning of the campaign of 1916, and how that speech was circulated over the country by the thousands. Just a little while ago this same gentleman made the keynote speech of his party for the campaign of 1918, and he devoted his time to an attack upon the President of the United States. There could be but one purpose in that speech, and that to belittle and discredit the President of the United States. My God, when men are returning from the battle front wounded, sore, and their comrades are left dead on the battle fields of France, how can any man so far forget his obligations to the boys at the front and his duty to his country as to take this floor and try for an hour to discredit and destroy the chosen leader of the American people?

In another body the same kind of an attack was made by a Republican from the State of Illinois. It seems that there has been an understanding between these two Republican leaders from Illinois. Then later there was a statement attributed to the chairman of the national committee of the Republican Party, assailing the Democratic administration from its head down, seeking to belittle the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and to impugn mean and bad motives to those in authority.

While this man in the White House is carrying upon his shoulders the mightiest burden that ever weighted down a public man, bound to his post of duty all the time, and using every ounce of his energy and employing every power of his great mind to win the war in Europe, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] seeks to discredit and destroy him here at home. The gentleman from Illinois for one hour assailed and attacked the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy. He used only a minute or two of that time in saying that "since war has been declared I am for it, and that we must make any sacrifice now, that the paramount issue is to win the war," and then he immediately turned and commenced a vicious and savage attack upon the very man who is leading the American people in the winning of the war. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For nearly an hour he nagged and criticized this great American leader. "Why," he says, "politics is not adjourned." Well, the President said: "Politics is adjourned." But this Republican leader disputes the statement of the President, and to prove his contention he brings up instances of where the President has given his opinion as to whether this man's or that man's conduct as an American entitled him to be reelected to Congress. If the officer in charge on the battle field can himself designate who will perform a certain duty in carrying out the war program and reject some that he believes are not as good and trustworthy as some others for that work, why will you deny to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy the right to warn the American people against sending back here a man whose conduct has been against and not for his country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, it is a mean and miserable brand of politics that will cause a man to undertake to discredit and destroy the leader of our Army at a time like this. What is it done for? "Politics is not adjourned," he says. "It lurks about us." He says the President goes to the golf links on Monday, to the movies on Tuesday, to vaudeville on Wednesday, to comic opera on Thursday, and so forth. That is the substance of what he says.

What was the purpose of that statement? Was he trying to strengthen the President of the United States in the minds and hearts of the American people, who are trusting their all to his care, or was he trying to discredit him and to make the people of the country believe that while their boys were fighting and dying at the front this great man was reveling in ease and sporting about the city of Washington? My God! what is Republican leadership coming to in this House? As I said before, no man in our country is burdened as is our great and beloved President. He is confined to the White House with mighty problems, problems that vitally affect not only a hundred million Americans, but the multiplied millions of the earth. [Applause.] The burden of this great war is upon him more than any other one man. And when he goes down to a moving-picture show to take a moment away from his close confinement and to look upon the screen and see the daring youths of America beating back the Hun and going over the top, this Republican leader would have the American people believe that the President of the United States is loafing on the job. The gentleman from Illinois knows better. Just what is it that moves him to make such a misleading and unwarranted attack? There is only one construction that can be placed upon this performance, and that is that the gentleman from Illinois was trying to convey to the country misinformation to the effect that while the war rages in Europe the Commander in Chief was frolicking about theaters here in Washington.

What other impression can you get? What was the purpose of such an attack? I repeat, Was it made for the purpose of helping the President, or was it made for the purpose of hurting him? An attack upon hi mnow is an attack upon the American people; and Mr. RODENBERG and all those like him who make such attacks, long after they have perished in the dust this man will live in the hearts of the liberty-loving people of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me read a line from the gentleman's speech.

He said: "The loyalty of a Republican is not to be determined by a subservient acquiescence in every whim and caprice of an administration which, unfortunately, had never yet overlooked a single partisan advantage." Is that true? Was the President looking to party advantage when he named the ablest Republican living, Elihu Root, of New York, to go over and settle the disturbances in Russia? What would you have said if the President had appointed Mr. Bryan or any other Democrat, and he had made such a miserable failure of the matter as did Mr. Root? I do not say that anybody could have done better than Mr. Root did, but what would such a man as the distinguished mouthpiece of the Republican Party, Mr. RODENBERG, have said if the President had appointed a Democrat and he had left behind him the awful condition that Mr. Root did?

Was the President looking to partisan advantage when he appointed ex-President Taft chairman of the National Labor Board? Was he looking to partisan advantage when he appointed the last Republican nominee for President, Mr. Hughes, special investigator of aircraft production?

No, gentlemen. Various Republicans are holding office in this city now, appointed all through this war work by the President and those under him, and yet such speeches as that of the gentleman from Illinois are sent out to the country to create a different impression and to induce the people to believe that the President has appointed Democrats alone and doing it for partisan purposes. In other words, the impression sought to be made is that while the President says "politics is adjourned." he is using the power of his great office to see to it that partisan politics is not adjourned, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned.

That is the purpose of a speech like that, and I submit that to the patriotic Republicans on that side—and there are a good many of them—some of whom have gone down the line and have supported the war program; some have been weeded out and more must be in the general election.

The people at the polls will attend to the situation in the November election. I know that some gentlemen have become very quiet and docile as the election draws near, like old Bill Smith, in my State, who operated a "blind tiger" in a prohibition settlement, and the evidence was so strong against him that Bill waived trial before the county judge and asked that his case go before the grand jury; but before the grand jury met, Bill joined old Liberty Church, and when court convened Bill was there looking humble and wearing a pious look, and the pillars of the church went down and appeared before the grand jury and said: "Bill has had a change of heart. He has joined the church, and we wish you would dismiss the case against him." They did, and after court adjourned and Bill had gone back, he was not there a week until he was operating a "blind tiger" at the same old stand. [Laughter and applause.]

So, gentlemen, we are not going to take any chances on some of you this time. There is too much at stake. We can not afford to take any chances. We have got to weed you out. Some of you talk low now and keep quiet, and you look humble like and pious, but I know how you have tried to handicap and embarrass the President just as long and just as far as you dared to go, and if you get back here you will do it again. I pray God that in the Sixty-sixth Congress there will not be a single man in either branch who will ever attack, as these Republican leaders have, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am sorry, but I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, Mr. RODENBERG says we can afford to sacrifice, we can afford this and that, in order to win the war. Why did he not refrain from making that vicious attack upon the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy? Why does he talk in one breath about doing things necessary to win the war and in the next one hundred breaths try to destroy the leader of our war forces?

How many red and striped books did the gentleman from Illinois send to his district showing how war came to America? Did he send any? How many attacks has he made upon this floor against the Kaiser and German autocracy? Not one. He has made two bitter attacks upon the President of the United States, but not one upon the Kaiser. I do not know whether the un-American and Potsdam sentiment in anybody's district has anything to do with a speech like that or not, but I just know that the gentleman in all his attacking has never attacked the Kaiser, and the Bible tells us that "by their fruits ye shall know them." [Applause.] When Woodrow Wilson is leading our cause and the German Kaiser is leading the German cause, and an American Member of Congress attacks Woodrow Wilson, where do you place him? For America's leader or against him?

The Bible says, "No man can serve two masters." "He that is not with Me is against Me." Then, where do you place the gentleman from Illinois? Is he for the President or is he against him? The President and not the Kaiser is our leader. [Applause.] Gentlemen, as an American to Americans, heart to heart, if you had shut your eyes and listened to that speech who would you have thought inspired it? A whole-hearted supporter of the American program, or a man who was making insidious attacks upon it in the effort to weaken it?

In another body a Republican from Illinois makes the same kind of attack just a day or two later. It seems that the plan of attack had been agreed upon. He began by saying that "we of the minority have given support to the administration and we must win the war," and he used this language—listen:

> If we fail in this war the torch of liberty goes out in the savagery of the Hun and the despotism of his king. If we fail, not America alone but mankind will go back into the feudalism of the Dark Ages.

Now, you would not think a man making that statement at the outset would then devote an hour and 50 minutes to an attack upon the very man who carries the torch of American liberty at this hour, and who, more than anyone else, stands between America and the feudalism of the Dark Ages, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] That was the attack of another Republican leader, a man from Illinois, in another body—Illinois, Illinois—the home of the martyred Lincoln, the great American. Can it be that these men truly represent your spirit in this hour of the Nation's peril? No; I deny it.

The power of the purse destroyed upon the political field yesterday one of the bravest and best Americans that ever came to Congress, Foss of Illinois [applause], and they did not even mention him in the headlines this morning. He was the best American in the race, but he was a poor man. Thompson, the pro-German, of Chicago, carried the city of Chicago. Think of it! In the Commonwealth of the great Lincoln, who stood for placing the man above the dollar, McCORMICK, the millionaire, carried off the prize, and FOSS, the statesman, is not even mentioned in the headlines; that brave American, fighting for the flag at all times and loyal to the core, lies prostrate upon the plains of the State of Illinois, not even enjoying honorable mention in the headlines. The headlines are, "McCORMICK beats Thompson." Well, I had rather see McCORMICK nominated than Thompson. BRITTEN, it appears, has been nominated by the Republicans of his district. Do you think that a man who wanted to exempt American citizens of Austrian and German blood from service to that flag on a foreign field, who introduced a measure which would excuse them from battle with barbarian hordes who would destroy this Government, should be recommissioned by Republicans in the State of Lincoln?

A Republican gentleman in another body makes an attack upon the war program of the administration. Gentlemen, you and I know that you have to do things in war times that you would not think of doing in time of peace, and some good Republicans into whose faces I now look know that that is true. It is necessary to mobilize the forces of the country, to call the boys to the colors, and to take over the great public utilities of the country when a strike might paralyze the arm of the Government and render it unable to carry on the war.

Take the case of the railroads, the telegraph and telephone systems. German spies were tapping the wires and up to all sorts of devilment through German propaganda in the United States, and these agencies for the communication of thought from camp to camp and to Commander in Chief and back again were being laid upon by the enemy, and a strike threatened that would have paralyzed the whole Government, and the President said: "We will have to take them over as an emergency measure and have Government supervision." We took over the railroads so that we would have Government supervision. And yet this Republican from Illinois in another body gets up on the floor and invites the attention of the railroad operators and owners, the telegraph and telephone owners, and says: "Let me talk to you." And then he undertakes to frighten all of these interests into believing that there was no necessity from a war standpoint to take over any of these great industries. The thing had already been decided by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and the law taking them over had been passed, and yet this Republican leader undertakes to stir up opposition to the war program, and he said: "I want to tell you more than that," speaking of the President, "he is not going to turn them back, he has taken them over for political purposes." That is the substance of what he said.

Gentlemen, will the patriotic people of Illinois stand for that unwise and unwarranted attack upon the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy? Will the rank and file of the Republican Party permit such a charge made at a time like this to go unchallenged at the polls? Why, he says that McAdoo is in charge of the finances, in charge of the railroads, and Burleson is in charge of the agencies of thought and communication, and that Gompers is president in all matters pertaining to labor. All three of them are American patriots rendering splendid service t. the country——

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield.

Mr. DENISON. I am not asking the gentleman to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DENISON. A parliamentary inquiry. I want to ask the Chairman if it is proper to refer to a Member of the Senate on the floor of the House in the manner in which the gentleman from Alabama is referring to him?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not propound a parliamentary inquiry; he can make a point of order.

Mr. DENISON. Then I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order in referring to a Senator from Illinois in his remarks.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not mentioned the Senator from Illinois and I have called no names. I mentioned a man in another body.

Mr. DENISON. "The gentleman from Illinois" knows that the gentleman from Alabama is referring to a Senator from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule on that subject is as follows:

A Member may not in debate in the House read the record of speeches and votes of Senators in such connection of comment or criticism that might be expected to lead to recrimination, and it was even held out of order to criticize words spoken in the Senate by one not a Member of that body in the course of an impeachment trial.

While the Senate may be referred to properly in debate it is not in order to discuss its functions or criticize its acts or refer to a Senator in terms of personal criticism.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Such references should not be made in this body to another body which would lead to recrimination on the part of other Members and to ill feeling between the two bodies. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] invokes the rule to protect a member of his party who has been attacking the Chief Executive of the Nation.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand whether the Chair ruled on the point of order or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair said that the gentleman from Alabama must proceed in order and try to avoid such references to another body as would impinge upon this rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will say this, that the laboring people of the United States ought to be satisfied with this Democratic administration. If Mr. Gompers now has access to the White House, something that he never enjoyed in the old Republican days, if the great leader of the laboring army of America can now have the ear of the President of the United States, how ought the army of laboring men feel upon that question at this time?

Mr. Chairman, the great army of laboring men in the United States should be satisfied with the administration of President Wilson. What a change from the old days when the Republican Party was in power in every branch of the Government and when the president of the Woolen Trust was President of the United States in all matters pertaining to schedule K in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, for he caused that schedule to remain in the bill even after Mr. Taft had said that it was inexcusable and indefensible. Yes; they were the old days when Gompers had no standing at the White House, and the laboring man cried in vain for recognition of his rights—when trust magnates and tariff barons held high carnival in the Nation's Capitol, robbing and plundering the American people through powers granted to them by the Republican Party. In those old days, Mr. Chairman—gone, thank God, never to return [applause]—labor was declared to be a commodity, a matter of barter among trust magnates, by the Republican leaders, and the laboring man was made an industrial slave by the tariff barons of the Republican Party. The fat and arrogant beneficiaries of the Republican tariff tax would assemble the laboring men at their factories on the day before election and tell them that if they voted the Democratic ticket that factory would shut its doors and they would lose their jobs. This mighty army of America's laboring men were humiliated and coerced and intimidated in the old days when the country was ruled by the Republican Party. But under Democratic rule labor is no longer a commodity. The shackles have been stricken from the feet of the industrial slave. [Applause.] No more coercion and intimidation at the ballot box, and the laboring man, with head erect and light upon his face, has a friend in the President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Those old days—I recall them—gone, thank God, forever! [Applause.] Under the Republican Party's administration, 21 men in Wall Street controlled the money supply of the United States. Twenty-one could produce a panic in 24 hours. Twenty-one men, under Republican rule, could paralyze every industry in the United States, but these mouthpieces of the Republican Party want to return to those days. These men who fear that we are establishing socialism now, where were they in those wicked old days? Not a word of protest was heard from any one of them. They contributed to the evil workings of the miserable system. Twenty-one men controlled the money supply of a hundred millions of people. You robbed the people annually of millions of dollars through the robber tariff. You old stand-pat tariff jugglers are yearning to return to those old and evil days when the poor man with a large family paid more tariff taxes than the richest man in the Republic. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], and GILLETTE, of Massachusetts, all want to return to those old and wicked days.

You then taxed the many for the benefit of the few, and you pillaged and plundered the American people that the captains of industry might build up colossal fortunes at the expense of the people. You gentlemen who become uneasy and alarmed now made no protest then. Now, in the midst of the greatest war of the world you try to frighten and divide the American people and destroy the great leader of their cause. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, I thought that these old standpatters had been weaned by now, but I find that they are still yearning for the old days of graft and plunder. Just mention a revenue bill, and these old protective-tariff relics commence to lick their chops. They remind me of the old fellows who were discussing the whisky habit. Some one said, "Is there any permanent cure for the habit?" One said, "I take no stock in the Keeley cure establishment at all; it is a place where they tone a fellow up for another booze battle; but, gentlemen, believe me, there is a real remedy. Old man Jimmie Simpkins's son tuck powerfully to licker, enduring of the summer, and 'long come a peddler who give him a remedy. He told him to take the insides of three green gourds and a bunch of tobacco stems and bile 'em down to a simmerin' stew, strain out the juice, and give his boy a goblet full on his empty stomach early in the morning." An interested bystander asked if he had given a dose to his boy. "Oh, yes," was the reply; "we give it to him about three weeks ago, and the boy has got now to where he can take a little water biled an' the white of er egg; but when they exercise him they have to blindfold him, for the mere sight of a tobacco patch or gourd vine sets him to heaving again, and they can not tell yet whether his relishment for licker is gone or not." [Laughter and applause.]

The President took the tariff out of politics and politics out of the tariff; but I see now that we will have to blindfold these old standpatters, for the mere sight of a robber schedule sets them to sighing and lapping out their tongues, and we see that their relishment for the old robber system is still as keen as ever. [Laughter and applause.]

Why these gentlemen talk about Gompers being president in all things which pertain to labor. Let me say again that I remember the old days when the tariff baron, fat and pompous under Republican rule, called his workmen around him on the day before the election and said to them, "To-morrow is election day, and if you vote the Democratic ticket I will shut down this mill and you will lose your job." That is the miserable condition that obtained under Republican rule; but these mouthpieces of the Republican Party said nothing then against a system that made industrial slaves of the wage earners of America. They want to return to it. When we have established here the rule of the people, and when the rank and file have more voice in the Government than they have had since Lincoln, these friends of sinister interests denounce this wholesome rule of the people as socialistic, and they want to return to the old days when the tariff barons clipped their coupons and listened to the clink of their ill-gotten dollars and reveled in luxury and ease at the expense of the wage earners and the toiling masses of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That was the situation. Why, Mr. Chairman, in those days Gompers, the head of organized labor, had no standing at the White House, the laboring man was not considered, except through the boss, the protective tariff baron, who contributed campaign funds to the Republican Party and in return had his protective tariff tax increased at the expense of the masses. This other Republican leader attacks Col. House, the trusted friend of the President. The President is getting information from every source that he can to help him win this war. But this Republican leader tries to destroy the man that the President is relying on to do certain important things in connection with the war. I could, if I would, go back to the time when Harriman was invited to inspect a President's message to Congress, but I will not do it.

I could go back to many other things in the old days of the Republican Party. My God! Do you think that the people of America are going to permit the power-hungry agents of the interests to get out here and beat their drums and sound their fifes in the effort to create division amongst the American people in order that they may again get control of the taxing power of the Republic? God help us, for the remainder of this war at least, to keep the taxing power out of the hands of the Republican Party! [Applause.]

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Amen!

Mr. HEFLIN. A good many of you on that side are saying "amen" derisively who will not say it after the November elections. You will not be here.

Mr. SNYDER. How about Maine?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Maine went for Hughes in 1916, and what happened to Hughes in the November election? [Laughter.] Why, Maine went for the Republicans two years ago, and it has got to where it is an index to Democratic victory, which now means American victory at the polls. [Applause.] That is what it means when Maine goes Republican, as it did the other day.

Let me read you a letter from a Republican to the chairman of the Republican national committee, Mr. Will Hays. You know he has been doing some talking lately, too. He encourages attacks upon the President of the United States. "You must destroy the Democratic leaders who are fighting to win the war, prostrate them, and then walk over and get the spoils of office." That is the effect of his utterances. But here is a letter to him from a Republican in Maryland, published in the Daily Mail. I read:

TO BACK WILSON AND BAFFLE THE HUNS IS THE DUTY OF ALL PATRIOTS, WIRES LEADING REPUBLICAN TO WILL HAYS, HEAD OF THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

The following telegram was sent Will Hays in Washington, and was received, but up to this date no answer has been received:

HAGERSTOWN, MD., August 11, 1918.

WILL HAYS,

Chairman Republican National Committee, Indianapolis, Ind.:

I am a Republican and want to ask you as the party leader a fair and serious question. Can there be a Republican congressional success this fall without giving encouragement to our enemies in the central Empires? We may say that Republicans who may be elected over Democrats will be loyal and strenuous for the war, but in Germany it will be said that because the President has been defeated his power to make war for American victory has been weakened. If as a result of the victory on the Marne the German junkers should be defeated at the polls would we not be encouraged? Of course, we know that patriotism is above partisanship and in our own national family Republican successes would not be disturbing, but in Germany the press is ruled by the Kaiser, and the defeat of the Wilson party would be given a meaning which would stimulate the Germans to further desperate efforts. In these critical times Germany needs all her moral courage to sustain her fighting military spirit. Why boost our enemies? Our boys are dying by thousands on French battle fields. Should we say to the men who are killing them that their great chief in the United States has failed to get the political support of his people? Should my vote help to write such a message of comfort and hope to Berlin? When you reply never mind about the effect in Washington and the United States. I know enough about that. It is what the effect is going to be in Germany if Wilson is not rousingly sustained by the people which probably will cause me to vote for a Democratic congressional candidate. Now, tell me, what will be the effect in Germany of licking Wilson at the polls by anybody for any reason? I am referring to the approaching congressional elections. When the presidential election occurs the situation might probably be changed and then we could stand by party principles. However, I do not feel that in our present situation we should permit party sentiment to detract from our loyal spirit of Americanism. I do not say this because I am less a Republican, having voted for McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, but because I am all the more American. I have two sons enlisted in the service and am proud of them. If party spirit were solely to govern us and we should be victorious in the congressional elections, I am sure it would enhearten Germany to put up at least several desperate battles in the hope that the opposition might force a peaceful adjustment. This would undoubtedly mean the loss of thousands of American lives. Do you not think that the American people at large should give serious consideration to such a contingency? I have the success of our arms, with the least possible loss of life, at heart, and, in addition, I can not be unmindful of my own boys. Hope for our boys comes home to all of us. Why risk anything now for politics. For your information I was prosecuting attorney of the United States Provisional Court of Porto Rico and later a member of the Code Commission of Porto Rico, the work assigned to me being the codification of the Penal Code and Code of Criminal Procedure of Porto Rico. This was from 1900 to 1904; then in August, 1904, I was sent to the Canal Zone as prosecuting attorney for the United States court there, fulfilling the duties of that office until the fall of 1907.

Very respectfully,

J. MARBOURG KEEDY.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, is this a strange note that this patriotic Republican is sounding? Why, Mr. Roosevelt, in 1898, said that it would not do to elect a Democratic Congress, that it would be regarded in Spain as a repudiation of the party in power. Ex-President Harrison said the same thing. If that doctrine applied then, when we were fighting a small power like Spain, my God, how much more ought it to count now, when the world is on fire and the earth is being drenched with human blood, when the very life of the Nation is at stake? [Applause.] How much more important that the American people should stand loyally behind the President and the party in power. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to submit these observations before I close. The men who are so anxious for the Republicans to carry the House—of course, I am not attributing these motives to some of you, because some of you have got good records, but I am talking about the bosses, I am talking about the leaders, who have shown by their attacks upon the President where their hearts really are. They are the fellows I am talking about. Do you know why it is that they are trying to move heaven and earth to get this House and the Senate? It is the profiteering element of the United States who want to get control of the taxing power. They are quietly sitting back just now. They are not saying much for publication now, but they are sore, some of them, because the Democratic administration—and some of you are helping to do it—is putting the tax burden of this war upon those most able to bear it, and that is where it ought to be. [Applause.]

But some of those who are bearing it are tired, and they want to stand from under. Editor Brisbane said in the Washington Times that the reason the Republicans want to carry the House and Senate is because they want to take the tax burden off of the back of the rich and put the tax on the back of the poor. Do we want that awful condition to come about? Gentlemen make reference to graft. My God, the days of the Spanish-American War, that little war, when graft was rampant in circles of your party and you served embalmed beef and meat with maggots in it to the American soldiers. Do you hear any charge like that now? And then there is talk about Hog Island.

That is up in Mr. MOORE's State, and everyone of the men in that scandalous performance are Republicans. I do not say that because they did graft that other Republicans do or will, but these gentlemen must not keep talking about graft under a Democratic administration when it is Republicans doing the grafting. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do want to say that I can commend some of the remarks that I have heard from the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MADDEN], and there are other patriots here from Illinois—McKENZIE, good and true; Foss; and some others that I could name. But, gentlemen, I must judge Members by what they do and say. By their fruits ye shall know them. Now, are you going to circulate the speech made by Mr. RODENBERG? Are you going to circulate the speech made by another Republican in another body attacking the Commander in Chief and seeking to sow seeds of discord, doubt, and division where all should be unity of purpose and concert of action? Do you believe that it is patriotic to circulate such speeches? Instead of circulating them you should repudiate them. I have seen the disposition on the part of some Republicans over there to shield men who have not been as loyal supporters of the Government as they should have been. I have attacked their records and exposed their conduct upon this floor, and some gentlemen over there have resorted to every pretense possible under the rules to shield them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no objection on this side, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania could not stop me if he desired to do so. He is one of the fellows that I had in mind in what I have just said. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I remember how he used to try to shield certain gentlemen over there who are going to be repudiated at the polls in November.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to give the gentleman a chance to tell about it. The gentleman is always very entertaining.

Mr. HEFLIN. I may have another opportunity. I can not tell about it in five minutes; it will take more than five minutes to pay proper respect to the gentleman's record. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am in control of the time, and possibly I can yield some of it to the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. I should be very grateful if the gentleman would, and I wish he had been willing for me to use time back yonder when I was going into the record of the gentlemen who were embarrassing and opposing the President of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am afraid many of them are from Wall Street. The gentleman should look into that.

Mr. HEFLIN. That reminds me of Newberry, the nominee of the Republican Party for the Senate in Michigan, who expended in the recent primary $178,000, the salary of a United States Senator for nearly 24 years, nearly a quarter of a century. The hungry bosses of the Republican Party, putting up seats in the Senate for sale and traffic to the highest bidder! The poor man of the United States has no chance against the moneybags of the mighty leaders of the Republican Party. The gentleman mentioned Wall Street; yes, two men from New York City contributed $25,000 each to the campaign of the Michigan man. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania feed on that nut for a while. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal that I would like to say, but I must close. I want to say this in conclusion: God bless the women of America. They are doing everything in their power to win this war. [Applause.] They have given their boys to die for the country; they are sending their sons to battle, and their love and blessings go with them; and the fathers of America, the great rank and file, are supporting lovingly and loyally Woodrow Wilson, the Commander in Chief. [Applause.] The voter who by his ballot helps to send back to this body a disloyal Member is unfaithful to our great leader and untrue to the boys who are fighting and dying at the front.

Mr. PURNELL rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield now. My time is nearly out. Mr. Chairman, let us stand together and present a solid front to the enemies of our country. Let no more discordant notes be sounded in this body. Let America present a solid front to our enemy and the world's enemy, the German Kaiser. Let these men who are trying to destroy Woodrow Wilson try to destroy the Kaiser. Let us be Americans all, whole-hearted Americans, with the light of loyalty upon our faces, following faithfully him who carries at this hour the Nation's flag. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

AN ILLUSTRATED PRIMER OF THE INCOME TAX PROVISIONS OF THE WAR-REVENUE BILL IN WORDS OF ONE OR MORE SYLLABLES.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is the purpose of these remarks to present plainly in the English of conversation and commerce the income-tax features of the pending war-revenue bill (H. R. 12863, 65th Cong., 2d sess.) chiefly by means of illustrations.

These taxes are five in number:

Individuals pay—
- First, a normal tax (sec. 210); and
- Second, a surtax (sec. 211).

Corporations pay—
- First, a normal tax (sec. 230); and
- Second, either a war-profits tax (secs. 310, 311, 312) or an excess-profits tax (secs. 315, 316), whichever is the higher.

These are the most important features of the bill, since $5,676,186,000 of the $8,182,492,000 the bill is intended to raise, or over 69 per cent of its total amount, will be derived from the income taxes.

In the computations given below too great detail has not been attempted, but the segregations are sufficient to illustrate the application of the principles upon which such taxes are based. Accuracy in the computations and simplicity in their presentation have been the chief aim.

Supposed returns from individuals and corporations have been used as illustrations, and the purpose has been to present illustrations covering typical cases, and as nearly as possible including all the essential features of each tax without embarrassing the illustrations with multitudes of details.

The adoption of the income-tax amendment to the Constitution prior to the outbreak of the present war was most fortunate. Otherwise it would have been a practically impossible thing to have raised over $8,000,000,000 by taxation and distributed the burden among the taxpayers with any approach to an equitable apportionment of the burden in proportion to ability to pay.

PARTNERSHIPS.

Partnerships as such do not pay the normal tax or the surtax. But each member of a partnership will pay both the normal tax and the surtax upon his pro rata share of the taxable income of the partnership, whether the earnings have been distributed or not.

INDIVIDUALS.

Individuals pay two kinds of income taxes, but on net income only:

1. A normal tax (sec. 210).
2. A surtax (sec. 211).

Net income (sec. 212) is ascertained by computing the gross income (sec. 213) and subtracting therefrom certain deductions (sec. 214) (but excluding certain items not deductible, sec. 215) and credits (sec. 216).

GROSS INCOME (SEC. 213).

Gross income (sec. 213 (a)) is the total upon all gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensations, from professions, vocations, trades, businesses, commerce, sales, or dealings in property, interest, rent, dividends, or securities, or gains from any business transaction, or gains, profits, or income from all sources whatever.

ITEMS NOT INCLUDED IN GROSS INCOME (SEC. 213 (B)).

The following items are not included in the gross income:

- Life insurance paid to beneficiaries or to an estate.
- Refund of premiums paid on life insurance.
- Value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, but income derived therefrom is included in gross income.
- Interest on securities issued by State, Territory, or municipalities or obligations of the United States, under certain restrictions.
- Accident or health insurance or money received under workingmen's compensation acts.
- Soldiers, sailors, and marines serving abroad or at sea pay income taxes only upon that portion of the compensation received from the Government which is in excess of $3,500.

DEDUCTIONS AND CREDITS.

Deductions (sec. 214): From the gross income ascertained as above stated there are subtracted the following deductions

(sec. 214) arising during the year for which the taxes are paid:

Ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in carrying on the trade, profession, or business.
Interest paid or accrued.
Taxes paid or accrued, except income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes levied by the United States.
Losses sustained and charged off, where not compensated for by insurance or otherwise.
Debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off.
Reasonable allowance for wear and tear.
Depletion in the case of oil or gas wells, or other natural deposits, or timber.
Contributions or gifts for religious, charitable, scientific, and educational purposes not in excess of 15 per cent of the net income.

Credits (sec. 216): There is further subtracted from the gross income the amount of the following credits (sec. 216):

Dividends received from corporations taxed before being distributed.
Interest on securities issued by public authority.
$1,000 for each single person, $2,000 for each head of family or married persons living together, and $200 for each dependent child.

INDIVIDUALS UNDER SECTION 220.

Amounts received by individuals as dividends from corporations which have paid tax prior to distribution are not subject to the normal tax, but are subject to the surtax.

SMALL SPECIAL DEDUCTIONS.

There is a special small deduction for individuals in computing the normal tax of $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for head of family or married persons living together and $200 for each dependent child. These deductions are made to relieve a limited amount of living expenses from taxation.

The equality of the apportionment of the burdens of taxation can be more readily determined if the method of the working of the proposed law is clear.

ILLUSTRATION.

This illustration is taken from the experience of John S. Brown, a thrifty and versatile merchant, doing business in a town of 20,000 people, interested in local business enterprises, buying and selling city and farm property, and lending money.

His gross income (sec 213 (a)) consists of the following items:

Profits as a merchant	$60,000
Salary as president of the local water company	3,000
Compensation as manager of the electric-light company	2,000
Sale of city property bought for $5,000 and sold for $8,000	3,000
Sale of farm bought for $20,000 and sold for $30,000	10,000
Rents from city property	1,000
Rents from farm property	2,000
Interest on money lent	3,000
Dividends from corporation securities	6,000
Total gross income	90,000

He is allowed the following deductions (sec. 214) from the gross income ascertained above:

Rent paid for store building	$5,000
Salaries to employees	10,000
Numerous incidental items necessary for the conduct of the business	2,000
State, county, and local taxes	4,000
Loss from fire, less insurance	2,000
Debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off	2,000
Wear, tear, and depreciation	1,000
Gifts and contributions—Red Cross, $1,000; church, $600; Y. M. C. A., $400; college endowment, $5,000; other contributions, $1,000	8,000
Total deductions	34,000

For the purposes of the normal tax only he is allowed the following credits (sec. 216) as a further reduction of the gross income:

Dividends received on corporation on which the tax was paid prior to distribution	$6,000
Interest on securities issued by public authority (none held).
$2,000 as married man living with his wife and $200 each for 5 dependent children	3,000
Total credits allowed	9,000

CERTAIN ITEMS OF WHICH NO ACCOUNT IS TAKEN IN COMPUTING THE GROSS INCOME.

He received during the year the following sums which are not included in his gross income, and of which no account is taken in computing his gross income (sec. 213 (b)):

Life insurance carried by his father	$5,000
From bequest of his father	10,000
Refund of premiums on insurance	100
Interest on public or municipal securities (none held).
From accident and health insurance	1,000

CERTAIN ITEMS FOR WHICH NO DEDUCTION IS ALLOWED.

He is not allowed to deduct these items (sec. 215):

Personal, living, and family expenses	$4,000
Improvements and betterments, adding to the value of the property	10,000
Repairs compensated for under the wear-and-tear allowance	4,000
Premiums on life insurance inuring to his benefit	1,000

COMPUTATION OF THE NORMAL TAX AND THE SURTAX.

Normal tax: We are now ready to compute his normal tax:

Gross income		$90,000
Deductions allowed	$34,000
Credits allowed	9,000
Total		43,000
Net income for purposes of the normal tax		47,000

He will pay normal tax on—

$4,000 at the rate of 6 per cent	240
$43,000 at the rate of 12 per cent	5,160
Total normal tax	5,400

Surtax: The surtax is computed as follows:

Gross income		$90,000
Deductions allowed	$34,000
No credits allowed	0
Total		34,000
Net income on which surtax is to be paid		56,000

The surtax is a graduated tax, and therefore his tax will be computed in the following manner:

On $5,000 to $7,500, or $2,500, at 2 per cent	$50
On $7,500 to $10,000, or $2,500, at 3 per cent	75
On $10,000 to $15,000, or $5,000, at 7 per cent	350
On $15,000 to $20,000, or $5,000, at 10 per cent	500
On $20,000 to $30,000, or $10,000, at 15 per cent	1,500
On $30,000 to $40,000, or $10,000, at 20 per cent	2,000
On $40,000 to $50,000, or $10,000, at 25 per cent	2,500
On $50,000 to $56,000, or $6,000, at 32 per cent	1,320
Total surtax	8,895

It will be noted that he had only $6,000 in the last bracket, which includes amounts from $50,000 to $60,000.

Combining the taxes he will pay—

Normal tax	$5,400
Surtax	8,895
Total	14,295

CORPORATIONS.

Corporations pay two out of three kinds of taxes. They pay on their net income only:

1. All pay a normal tax (sec. 230), and
2. Either an excess-profits tax, or
   A war-profits tax.

They pay either the excess-profits tax or the war-profits tax, depending upon which of the two will cause the larger sum to be paid into the Treasury.

GROSS INCOME (SEC. 233).

For the purpose of the normal tax, gross income is ascertained in the same manner as that for individuals (sec. 213), with the modifications provided in section 233 for three special cases.

From the gross income so ascertained there is then subtracted the deductions allowed in sections 234, 236, and 320 to determine the net upon which the normal tax is to be paid.

The Treasury sheets will contain all the items in detail and with minuteness. It would complicate this explanation and require a large number of pages even to enumerate all the possible items that are deductible arising out of the various trades, businesses, and occupations. I have attempted only the general descriptions.

For the purposes of these taxes the important factor is to ascertain the net income for the taxable year, and around the various methods for arriving thereat, for determining the average profits for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, known as the prewar period, and the definition of invested capital the battle of conflicting opinions rages.

DEDUCTIONS AND CREDITS.

Deductions (sec. 234): The following deductions from the gross income are authorized which arise during the year for which the tax is to be paid:

All ordinary, usual, and necessary expenses paid or incurred in carrying on the business, trade, or occupation.

Taxes paid or accrued, except income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes, or taxes assessed against local benefits; but the war-profits or excess-profits tax paid by a corporation is deducted from its net income before computing its normal tax.

Losses sustained and charged off and not covered by insurance or otherwise.

Debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off.

Dividends from other corporations which have paid tax thereon.

Allowances for exhaustion, wear, and tear of property used in the trade or business.

Amortization allowance for buildings constructed, machinery provided, etc., used in the production of articles for the present war.

Depletion allowance for oil or gas wells, or other natural deposits and timber.

Additions required by law to reserve funds in case of insurance companies, death losses, and annuity payments.

There are other provisions for insurance companies.

Credits (sec. 236): The following credits are also allowed to be deducted from the gross income arising in the year for which the tax is to be paid:

Income from securities issued by public authority and included in the gross income under section 233.

War-profits and excess-profits taxes, for normal tax only.

Special exemption of $3,000 for war-profits tax and excess-profits tax.

Special exemption of $2,000 for normal corporation tax.

Certain credits for taxes paid to other countries. (Sec. 238.)

ITEMS NOT DEDUCTIBLE.

The same items as for individuals under section 215.

WAR-PROFITS AND EXCESS-PROFITS TAXES.

It will be necessary to compute these taxes before computing the normal tax, as the amount paid in such taxes is deducted from the net income before computing the normal tax.

Both the war-profits tax and the excess-profits tax are computed for each corporation, which will pay whichever is the higher.

There are some special cases. Section 302 provides that a corporation having an invested capital of not more than $25,000 shall not pay more than 35 per cent on its net income in excess of $3,000, and a corporation having more than $25,000, and not exceeding $50,000, of invested capital shall pay not to exceed 40 per cent on its net income in excess of $3,000. This section, however, does not apply to a corporation having a net income in excess of $50,000.

Section 303 provides that a corporation whose earnings are chiefly due to the personal work of its principal owners shall pay the normal tax and 20 per cent of its net income in excess of $3,000; but income from Government contracts and corporations having over $100,000 capital will pay either the excess-profits or the war-profits tax.

WAR-PROFITS METHOD (SECS. 310–312).

The pivotal question under the war-profits method is, "What was the average yearly net income of the corporation during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, called the 'prewar' period?"

The tax is 80 per cent of the net taxable income.

ILLUSTRATION.

The Carson Cement Corporation was organized in 1908 and has been a going concern since that date. In 1911 its net income was $50,000, in 1912 was $60,000, and in 1913 was $70,000. The average for the prewar period was therefore $60,000.

The invested capital was originally $250,000, but in 1918 it was increased by $50,000, making the capital for 1918 $300,000.

The net income for 1918 is $150,000.

The tax will then be computed as follows:

Net income for 1918		$150,000
Special exemption	$3,000
Prewar net income	60,000
10 per cent of added capital	5,000
Total deductions		68,000
Amount on which war-profits tax is computed		82,000
80 per cent of net taxable income of $82,000 is		65,600

PARENTHESIS (SEC. 312B).

If the corporation was not in existence during the whole of any one calendar year during the prewar period; or if it had no net income for the prewar period; or if the average net income for the prewar period (plus or minus as the case may be 10 per cent of the invested capital added or withdrawn since the close of the prewar period) is less than 10 per cent of its invested capital for the taxable year, then its prewar credits shall be:

Specific exemption	$3,000
10 per cent of invested capital for the taxable year.

The following illustration shows how the tax will be computed.

The Lake Coal Corporation had no net income in the prewar period, but had an invested capital of $100,000.

In 1918 it had a net income of $40,000.

The tax in this instance will be computed as follows:

Net income for 1918		$40,000
Special exemption	$3,000
10 per cent of invested capital	10,000
Total deductions		13,000
Taxable income subject to war-profits tax		27,000
80 per cent of net taxable income of $27,000		21,600

EXCESS-PROFITS METHOD (SECS. 315–316).

The determining factors under the excess-profits method are the invested capital and the rate per cent earned thereon as net profit.

ILLUSTRATION.

The Carson Coal Co. has an invested capital of $300,000 for the taxable year of 1918.

It makes $150,000 net profits, or at a rate of 50 per cent.

Net profit,	Rate of profit,	Invested capital,
$150,000.	50 per cent.	$300,000.

Net income for 1918		$150,000
Special exemption	$3,000
8 per cent of invested capital	24,000
Total deductions		27,000
Net income subject to excess-profits tax		123,000

Computation of tax:

35 per cent of net taxable income in excess of 8 per cent of invested capital and not in excess of 15 per cent of invested capital, or 7 per cent of $300,000, which is $21,000, less special exemption of $3,000, leaving $18,000 taxed at 35 per cent	6,300
50 per cent of net taxable income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent of invested capital, or 5 per cent of the invested capital of $300,000, which is $15,000, taxed at 50 per cent	7,500
70 per cent of net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital, or the difference between 50 per cent, the net rate of earning, and 20 per cent, or 30 per cent of $300,000, or $90,000 taxed at 70 per cent	63,000
Total excess-profits tax	76,800

The computation under the last paragraph can be simplified by computing 70 per cent on the remainder of the net taxable income left after subtracting the amounts in the first and second paragraphs, as follows:

$123,000 less $18,000 and $15,000 leaves $90,000; 70 per cent of $90,000 is $63,000.

Since the war-profits tax is $65,600 and the excess-profits tax is $76,800, or $11,200 higher, it is evident that the Carson Cement Corporation will pay the excess-profits tax, because it is higher than the war-profits tax.

SIMPLIFIED METHOD OF COMPUTING THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

Take the case of the Carson Cement Corporation used above:

Net profit,	Rate of profit,	Invested capital,
$150,000	50 per cent	$300,000

Net income for 1918		$150,000
Special exemption	$3,000
8 per cent on invested capital	24,000
Total deductions		27,000
Net taxable income for 1918		123,000
35 per cent on 7 per cent of invested capital less $3,000, or $18,000		6,300
50 per cent on 5 per cent of invested capital of $15,000		7,500
70 per cent on remainder of taxable income of $90,000		63,000
Total excess-profits tax		76,800

Explanation.—The brackets under the excess-profits tax are:

35 per cent on the part of the net income in excess of 8 per cent and not in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital, which difference in per cents is the 7 per cent used above.

50 per cent on the part in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent of invested capital, which is the 5 per cent used above.

70 per cent of the part in excess of 20 per cent of invested capital, which of course will be the remainder of the net taxable income.

WHY THE WAR-PROFITS TAXES AND THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAXES MUST BOTH BE COMPUTED BEFORE THE NORMAL TAX IS COMPUTED.

Since a corporation is entitled to deduct either the war-profits tax or the excess-profits tax, whichever it pays, from its net income before the normal tax is computed, it is necessary to compute them both, to ascertain which is the higher tax and in order to deduct the tax so paid from the net income to find the amount remaining upon which the normal tax is to be computed.

THE NORMAL TAX ON CORPORATIONS (SEC. 230).

This tax (sec. 230) is levied only on the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236, which are—

Interest received from obligations issued by public authority, which are included in gross income under section 233.

Excess and war profits taxes imposed by Congress for the same taxable year.

Special exemption of $2,000.

The rate of the tax is—

12 per cent on the amount distributed in dividends or used to pay off bonds or other interest-bearing obligations issued prior to the beginning of the taxable year.

18 per cent of the remainder of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236.

The Carson Cement Corporation will pay a normal tax as computed as follows:

Net income for 1918		$150,000
Interest on obligations issued by public authority	0
Excess-profits tax	$76,800
Specific exemption	2,000
Total deductions		78,800
Net income liable to normal tax		71,200

Of this amount, suppose the corporation distributes to its stockholders a dividend of 10 per cent on its capital, or $30,000, and retains $41,200 in its business, the tax will then be computed as follows:

12 per cent on the $30,000 distributed	$3,600
18 per cent on the $41,200 not distributed	7,416
Total normal tax	11,016

The total tax paid by the Carson Cement Corporation for the year will be—

Excess-profits tax	$76,800
Normal tax	11,016
Total tax	87,816

Or it will pay 59.5 per cent of its net income in taxes.

WHEN A CORPORATION WILL PAY UNDER THE WAR-PROFITS TAX.

The Union Foundry Corporation has an invested capital of $200,000; its prewar profits were $15,000 in 1911, $20,000 in 1912, and $25,000 in 1913, or, its average profit for the prewar period was $20,000; it had a net income in 1918 of $70,000. Its taxes will be computed as follows:

WAR PROFITS METHOD (SECS. 310–312).

Net income for 1918		$70,000
Special exemption	$3,000
Prewar profit	20,000
Total deductions		23,000
Net taxable income for 1918		47,000
80 per cent of $47,000, or war-profits tax		37,600

EXCESS-PROFITS METHOD (SECS. 315–316).

Net profit.	Rate of profit for 1918,	Invested capital,
$70,000.	35 per cent.	$200,000.

Net income for 1918		$70,000
Special exemption	$3,000
8% of invested capital	16,000
Total deductions		19,000
Net taxable income		51,000
35 per cent on 7 per cent of invested capital, less $3,000, or $11,000		3,850
50 per cent on 5 per cent of invested capital, or $10,000		5,000
70 per cent on remainder of taxable income, or $30,000		21,000
Total excess-profits tax		29,850

Since the war-profits tax of $37,600 is larger than the excess-profits tax of $29,850, the Union Foundry Corporation will pay the war-profits tax.

NORMAL TAX.

Normal tax (sec. 230): Having ascertained that the Union Foundry Corporation will pay the war-profits tax, we are now ready to compute the normal tax of the corporation, as follows:

Net income for 1918		$70,000
Specific exemption	$2,000
War-profits tax	37,600
Interest on obligations of other corporations	0
Total deductions		39,600
Net income subject to normal tax		30,400

Of this amount the corporation distributed to its stockholders a dividend of 10 per cent on its capital, or $20,000, and retained $10,400 in its business.

The normal will be then computed as follows:

12 per cent on $20,000, distributed	$2,400
18 per cent on $10,400, not distributed	1,872
Total normal tax	4,272

The total tax paid by the Union Foundry Corporation will be—

War-profits tax	$37,600
Normal tax	4,272
Total tax	41,872

Or, it will pay 60 per cent of its total net income in taxes.

VERIFICATION OF RETURNS.

In order to prevent evasions of the taxes involved in incorrect returns, untenable statements of invested capital, prewar earnings or claims for deductions, or other errors, the bill provides an additional appropriation for the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue in the sum of $7,500,000 for the employment of some 2,500 persons to investigate the returns made for the past year and succeeding years to ascertain that every taxpayer pays the correct amount of tax. The Treasury thinks that with this additional assistance it can obtain several hundreds of millions more for the past year.

Mr. Chairman, I have here some charts, and it is my purpose to speak further on the five income-tax features of the bill, showing their operation by means of these charts, which have been prepared to illustrate to the eye the distinguishing features of these taxes and the methods of computing them. Some repetition will be unavoidable.

The pending revenue bill contains five kinds of income taxes. Out of the $8,170,000,000 to be raised by taxation, $5,684,000,000 are to be raised from the income tax, or 69 per cent of the entire amount. If it had not been for the adoption of the income-tax amendment to the Constitution prior to the outbreak of this war, it would have been almost impossible to have financed the war and apportioned the tax burden with any justice among the people who bear it.

CHART I.

COMPUTING THE GROSS INCOME, DEDUCTIONS, AND CREDITS OF JOHN S. BROWN IN ORDER TO ASCERTAIN HIS NET INCOME.

Gross income. (Sec. 213 (a).)

Profits as merchant	$60,000
Compensation as president of the local water company	3,000
Compensation as manager of the local electric light company	2,000
Profit on sale of city property	3,000
Profit on sale of farm property	10,000
Rents from city property	1,000
Rents from farm property	2,000
Interest on money loaned	3,000
Dividends received from corporation securities	6,000
Total gross income	90,000

Deductions. (Sec. 214.)

Rent paid for use of store building	5,000
Pay of employees	10,000
Incidental expenses in connection with the business	2,000
State, county, and local taxes for the year	4,000
Loss from fire, less insurance received	2,000

The first chart deals with the income taxes paid by individuals. This chart takes the supposed returns made for and the taxes paid by John S. Brown, a merchant in a town of 20,000 people, doing a general mercantile business, buying and selling real estate, city and country, owning a farm and some city property, and having some money at interest. As the income taxes are levied only on net incomes the important factor, then, in any computation for any individual it is essential to ascertain what his net income is. Mr. Brown has a gross income under section 213 (a) of the bill on his profits as merchant, of $60,000; as president of the local water company, $3,000; as manager of the local electric light company, $2,000; as a profit on a city property that he bought and sold, $3,000; as profit on farm property, $10,000; rent on city property, rent on farm property, interest on loans, dividends from corporations securities, making a total gross income of $90,000.

The deductions allowed under the bill are the rent on the store building, the pay of the employees, incidental expenses, city, county, and local taxes, loss from fire, insurance, debts, wear and tear in depreciation, gifts, and purchases, making a total of $34,000. The credits provided in the bill under section 216 and shown in Chart I apply only to normal taxes on the individual and not on the surtax on individuals. So the credits under this section are the dividends from corporations, which he must report in his gross income, but for which he is given credit in the credits, interest on public securities, of which he held none, and, being a married man, living with his wife, he is entitled to a $2,000 deduction, and, having five children, a further deduction of $200 for each child, making $3,000 in all, and a total credit of $9,000.

CHART II.

NORMAL TAX TO BE PAID BY JOHN S. BROWN.

Gross income		$90,000
Deductions	$34,000
Credits	9,000
Total of items to be subtracted		43,000
Net amount subject to normal tax		47,000
He will pay on—
$4,000 at a rate of 6 per cent		240
$43,000 at the rate of 12 per cent		5,160
Total normal tax		5,400

Having ascertained the factors necessary to determine what tax you will pay, we will compute the normal tax on Mr. Brown, paid on net income only. The gross income is $90,000. The deductions are $34,000, the credits are $9,000, making a total of $43,000 to be subtracted from the gross income. Deducting $43,000 from the $90,000 it leaves $47,000 subject to the normal tax. He will pay on the first $4,000 of this at the rate of 6 per cent, or $240; he will pay on the remainder of $43,000 at 12 per cent, or $5,160; or the total normal tax will be $5,400.

CHART III.

SURTAX TO BE PAID BY JOHN S. BROWN.

Gross income		$90,000
Deductions	$34,000
Credits (not allowed).
Total of items to be subtracted		34,000
Net amount subject to surtax		56,000

On amounts between—
$5,000 to $7,500, or $2,500, he will pay at the rate of 2 per cent	50
$7,500 to $10,000, or $2,500, he will pay at the rate of 3 per cent	75
$10,000 to $15,000, or $5,000, he will pay at the rate of 7 per cent	350
$15,000 to $20,000, or $5,000, he will pay at the rate of 10 per cent	500
$20,000 to $30,000, or $10,000, he will pay at the rate of 15 per cent	1,500
$30,000 to $40,000, or $10,000, he will pay at the rate of 20 per cent	2,000
$40,000 to $50,000, or $10,000, he will pay at the rate of 25 per cent	2,500
$50,000 to $56,000, or $6,000, he will pay at the rate of 32 per cent	1,920
Total surtax	8,895
His total tax will be—
Normal tax	5,400
Surtax	8,895
Total of taxes	14,295

The surtax is computed on the same amounts, except that he is not allowed to deduct the credits. His gross income is $90,000; his total deduction is $34,000. He is not allowed credits provided in section 216. This leaves an amount of $56,000 upon which the surtax is to be calculated. The surtax begins at $5,000. He will really pay surtax on $51,000 only. On the amount between $5,000 and $7,000, or $2,500, he pays 2 per cent, or $50; on the amount from $7,500 to $10,000, or $2,500, at 3 per cent, or $75; and then, in the next bracket, on $5,000, at 7 per cent, $350; the next bracket, of $5,000, at 10 per cent, $50; the next bracket, of $10,000, 15 per cent, $1,500; the next, $10,000, at 20 per cent, or $2,000; the next, of $10,000 at 25 per cent, $2,500; and then on the difference between $50,000 and $56,000, or $6,000, at 32 per cent, $1,920, or a total surtax of $8,895.

Add the normal tax of $5,400 to the total surtax of $8,895, and it is apparent that Mr. Brown will pay a total of $14,295 in taxes on this statement of facts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was shown here the other day in the debate that on a $7,500 income $470 would be paid.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is right if the $7,500 is the net income.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the total for an income of $7,500 a year?

Mr. HAWLEY. Net taxable income on $7,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Less $5,000. Has the gentleman made a calculation as to what a man would pay whose income was $1,000,000?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I have not, for the reason that I could find no larger sheets than these in town, but I will insert such a calculation in my remarks as Chart II.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is that all the tax an individual pays—the normal tax and the surtax?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; the normal tax and the surtax. The individual has been relieved under this bill from paying the excess-profits tax and the normal tax rates and the surtax rates have been increased.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman's calculation agree with that on page 87 of the report of the committee?

Mr. HAWLEY. Exactly; because my figures were gone over by the most capable and able clerk of the committee, Mr. John E. Walker.

Mr. HARDY. The reason I ask that question is that they do not give the odd number; yes, they give $56,000, and they say the tax under this bill on $55,000—yours is what?

Mr. HAWLEY. On $56,000——

Mr. HARDY. Is $16,895, and you have got it on $56,000 as $14,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not verified the figures the gentleman refers to, but the exemptions may be different.

Mr. STAFFORD. There may be more deductions on account of children, and perhaps he was a single man instead of a married man.

Mr. HARDY. It was $14,695. I reckon there were children.

Mr. HAWLEY. That would account for the difference.

Mr. HARDY. This was for a married man, but with no children.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Among the deductions are bad debts. What does that include?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is stated in the bill to be debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off during the taxable year.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. As to the individual tax and the normal tax and surtax, would it not have been possible for the committee to have worked out some kind of a simplified scheme in one schedule and not two? It would simplify the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. They have done so, and there is in the report, I think, a table showing the combined tax. But the facts in every individual case are different, and in order to make it perfectly clear and to make the bill work perfectly fairly among all individuals it was thought best to retain the two kinds of tax on the individual, the normal tax and the surtax. It is not a complex matter as it is now arranged.

CORPORATIONS.

Corporations pay two out of three kinds of taxes. They pay a normal corporation tax in every instance and either a war-profits tax or an excess-profits tax. It is necessary to compute both the war-profits tax and the excess-profits tax on each corporation, because the corporation will pay whichever is the higher tax. In order to ascertain that fact, then, each corporation must compute both war profits and excess profits taxes.

I have not given a statement of facts regarding the gross income deductions, credits, and so forth, in order to ascertain the net income for corporations for the reason that they are arrived at in a manner similar to that used in the case of an individual.

Each corporation's gross income and its deductions will vary according to its operations. Each will have items that others will not have. As legislators, I thought we would probably be more concerned in the nature of the taxes and how they are computed, because that involves a matter of judgment upon which we have to pass in the enactment of the legislation.

CHART IV.

COMPUTATION OF WAR-PROFITS TAX ON CARSON CEMENT CORPORATION.

Data for computation.

[Organized in 1908 and has been a going concern since.]

Original capital invested		$250,000
Capital added in 1918		50,000
Prewar earning: 1911, $50,000; 1912, $60,000; 1913, $70,000; average prewar earning		60,000
Net income for 1918		150,000
Computation of tax.
Net income for 1918		150,000
Specific exemption	$3,000
Prewar average earning	60,000
Ten per cent on $50,000 capital added in 1918	5,000
Total to be subtracted		68,000
Net income subject to war-profits tax		82,000

Eighty per cent tax on $82,000 amounts to $65,600, which is the war-profits tax.

I have taken here what is called the Carson Cement Corporation. It was organized in 1908. It has been a going concern ever since. It had an invested capital of $250,000 to begin with, but in 1918, this taxable year, it added $50,000 to its capital. Now, the determining factor in the war-profits taxes is the prewar earnings of the corporation. You can not compute this tax unless you know what its prewar earnings were. The prewar years are 1911, 1912, and 1913. In 1911 this corporation had a net income of $50,000; in 1912 it had a net income of $60,000, and in 1913 a net income of $70,000. It is evident that its average prewar earnings were $60,000.

Now, the net income for 1918 was $150,000 for the taxable year. Now, compute the tax. The net income for 1918 was $150,000; a special exemption is allowed to all corporations of $3,000. That is to take care of some small corporations.

It also takes into consideration the fact that in the prewar years many corporations were making little or nothing. Those happened to be bad years for some particular kinds of business, so corporations are allowed a $3,000 special exemption. In addition, they are allowed as a deduction 10 per cent of the added capital, or 10 per cent of $50,000, or $5,000, making a total deduction of $68,000. Corporations are allowed this deduction of 10 per cent on all additions to the invested capital put into the business since the prewar period.

Corporations have a special exemption of $3,000 from net income in computing the war-profits tax or the excess-profits tax, and $2,000 in computing the normal tax.

Now, $150,000 net income minus $68,000 leaves $82,000 as the amount on which to compute the war excess-profits tax. The war excess-profits tax is 80 per cent of the taxable amount of $82,000, or $65,600.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman goes to that—the prewar system applies in the excess-profits tax in the existing law, does it not?

Mr. HAWLEY. We take no account, as I understand the law, of the prewar earnings in computing the excess-profits tax.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The prewar basis is used in the statute we now have. I am distinguishing the war-profits tax from the existing excess-profits tax.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not gone back into the existing law. I was simply discussing what the present bill provides, in order to avoid complications.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Before the gentleman leaves the war-profits tax will the gentleman state what will be deducted if the corporation made no money during the prewar period, but lost money?

Mr. HAWLEY. If the corporation was not in existence during the whole of any one calendar year during the prewar period; or if it had no net income during the prewar period; or——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it was not in operation or made less than 10 per cent.

Mr. HAWLEY (continuing). Or if the average net income for the prewar period (plus or minus, as the case may be. 10 per cent of the invested capital added or withdrawn since the close of the prewar period) is less than 10 per cent of its invested capital for the taxable year, then the tax will be computed as follows: There will be deducted from the net income for the taxable year the special exemption of $3,000, and also 10 per cent of the invested capital for the year; the tax will be 80 per cent of the remainder, as a war-profits tax.

Mr. SNYDER. What would the normal tax in addition be?

Mr. HAWLEY. You can not tell that until you ascertain whether the corporation will pay under the war-profits or excess-profit method.

Now, the central feature of the excess-profit method is the invested capital. I have a chart—Chart V—illustrating the excess-profits method.

CHART V.

COMPUTATION OF EXCESS-PROFITS TAX PAID BY THE CARSON CEMENT CORPORATION.

Data for computation.

Invested capital in 1918		$300,000
Net income for 1918		150,000
Computation of tax.
Net income for 1918		150,000
Special exemption	$3,000
8 per cent of invested capital	24,000
Total to be subtracted		27,000
Net income subject to excess-profits tax		123,000
35 per cent on portion of taxable income in excess of 8 per cent and not in excess of 15 per cent of invested capital or 7 per cent of $300,000, which is $21,000, less $3,000 special exemption, leaving $18,000		6,300
50 per cent on portion of taxable income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent of invested capital, or 5 per cent of $300,000 or $15,000		7,500
70 per cent on remainder of taxable income, or $90,000		63,000
Total excess-profits tax		76,800

Since the excess-profits tax of $76,800 is higher than the war-profits tax of $65,600, the Carson Cement Corporation will pay the excess-profits tax.

NOTE.—If the special exemption of $3,000 is not exhausted in the first bracket the remainder is subtracted from taxable amounts in succeeding brackets until the $3,000 has all been deducted.

I am still using the illustration of the Carson Cement Corporation. Invested capital, $300,000; net income, $150,000; rate of profit, 50 per cent—that is, the net income for 1918 is $150,000. It has a specific exemption also of $3,000. Now, the exemption on account of invested capital is 8 per cent of the invested capital. Eight per cent of $300,000 is $24,000. So it will have a total deduction of $3,000 plus $24,000, or $27,000, leaving a net amount taxable under the excess-profits tax method of $123,000. It pays 35 per cent on that part of the net income which is in excess of 8 per cent of the capital and not in excess of 15 per cent of the capital. The difference between 8 per cent and 15 per cent is 7 per cent. Seven per cent of $300,000 is $21,000; subtracting the $3,000 special exemption, leaves $18,000 to be taxed under the first bracket, at 35 per cent, and results in a tax in this bracket of $6,300.

Somebody will say, "What about the $24,000 exemption, representing 8 per cent of the invested capital?" As the bracket began with 8 per cent, that will de facto exempt the 8 per cent of invested capital, or $24,000. The second bracket is 50 per cent, on that part of the net income by which it exceeds 15 per cent of the invested capital and does not exceed 20 per cent of the invested capital, which is 5 per cent, and 5 per cent of $300,000 is $15,000. Fifty per cent of $15,000 produces a tax of $7,500. Then the tax in the third bracket is 70 per cent on the remainder of the net income. Adding $18,000 and $15,000 together we have $33,000. Subtracting that from $123,000, we have a remainder of $90,000 to be taxed at 70 per cent, resulting in a further amount of $63,000. Adding together $6,300, $7,500, and $63,000 we have a total excess-profits tax of $76,800.

Now, looking over the figures we find that the corporation will pay $65,600 under the war-profit tax, but under the excess-profits tax it will pay $76,800. It is apparent that it will be required to pay the excess-profits tax, because that is the higher of the two.

CHART VI.

NORMAL TAX PAID BY THE CARSON CEMENT CORPORATION.

Computation of tax.

Net income for 1918		$150,000
Special exemption	$2,000
Excess-profits tax	76,800
Total to be subtracted		78,800
Net amount subject to normal tax		71,200
The corporation distributes a 10 per cent dividend to its stockholders, amounting to		30,000
It retains in its business undistributed		41,200
Tax:
12 per cent on $30,000 distributed		3,600
18 per cent on $41,200 not distributed		7,416
Total normal tax		11,016
Total taxes paid by the Carson Cement Corporation:
Normal tax		11,016
Excess-profits tax		76,800
Total of taxes		87,816

Which is 59.5 per cent of its net income of $150,000.

Having ascertained the fact that the Carson Cement Corporation will pay the excess-profits tax, we will compute its normal tax. Net income for 1918, $150,000. Excess-profits tax, $76,800. It is allowed that deduction, because we do not charge a tax on a tax. The special exemption under the normal tax is only $2,000. You will recall, however, to avoid error that the special exemption under the war-profits tax and the excess-profits tax is $3,000. That makes a total deduction of $78,800. Subtracting, we find the amount subject to the normal tax is $71,200. Now, under the bill, if the corporation retains all of this amount in its business it pays 18 per cent normal tax on it, but if it distributes part as dividends and retains the rest in its business it still pays on what it retains in its business 18 per cent, but only 12 per cent on that which it distributes. Taking this into consideration, suppose the corporation distributes a 10 per cent dividend on its invested capital of $300,000, or $30,000 in dividends. It retains undistributed, $41,200. Now, the tax, 12 per cent on $30,000 distributed, is $3,600; 18 per cent on the $41,600 not distributed is $7,416; thus making a total normal tax of $11,016. The total tax to be paid by the corporation consists of the normal tax of $11,016 plus the excess-profits tax, being the higher, of $76,800, or a total of $87,816, or 59.5 per cent of its net income.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has shown two informing tables, and I think they help the House very much to understand the difference between the war-profits tax as advocated by the Secretary of the Treasury and the excess-profits tax as originally advocated by the committee. Under the scheme he has presented in these two tables it would appear that under the excess-profits-tax method the corporation would pay $87,816 and under the war-profits tax it would pay only $65,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. And it would have to pay, in addition to the excess profits, a normal tax also.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted to bring out. I wanted the gentleman, because he has given great thought to the matter, to explain which one of the systems would pay the higher tax.

Mr. HARDY. In the corporation tax can the gentleman state whether the normal tax should be taken out before the excess-profit tax, or the excess-profit tax taken out before the normal tax?

Mr. HAWLEY. In order to compute the normal tax you must find out first what the excess-profits tax is and what the war-profits tax is, to ascertain which is the larger, and subtract that from the net income before computing the normal tax. The last tax to be computed is the normal tax.

Mr. SNYDER. The normal 12 per cent tax does not apply to the surtax nor to that part of the profit after the surtax is deducted?

Mr. HAWLEY. Corporations do not pay a surtax.

Mr. SNYDER. I did not mean the surtax, I meant the excess-profit tax.

Mr. HAWLEY. No; the normal tax applies only to the amount remaining after the war-profits tax or the excess-profits tax has been deducted from the net income.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the bill, it would be the policy of stockholders who pay a surtax to have the earnings retained as capital, and pay 18 per cent, rather than to have the earnings distributed and pay 12 per cent, which latter would have to pay a surtax by individual holders. Am I right in that construction of the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. The dividends received from a corporation which has already paid the tax are exempt from the normal tax on individuals, as was shown in the illustration of Mr. Brown.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Exempt from the normal tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the question I propounded, whether it would be to the interest of the stockholder or the policy of the corporation where the stockholders would pay the surtax on the dividends to have them retained and pay 18 per cent, rather than declare them and pay 12 per cent to the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest to the gentleman that it was for that very purpose that the committee made the differential, or, in other words, offered a bonus for distributing the earnings, because a large number of corporations are controlled by rich men, and otherwise no distribution would be made. In a case like this they might prefer to pay the 18 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose during the year the corporation had invested its income from time to time in liberty bonds. When the time came around to compute the tax on the corporation would the liberty bonds be taxed the same as though they had kept the money in the Treasury?

Mr. HAWLEY. Investments in liberty bonds are not deductible from the net income in computing the normal tax.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. VARE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has a table showing what this same business would pay if it was controlled by an individual?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will insert such a calculation in my remarks as Chart VII.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. On the war-profit table you have an item of $50,000 added to the capital in 1918, making a deduction of 10 per cent. How is that arrived at?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is in the war-profit method, and is based on the fact that it was added in the taxable year, or since the prewar period.

Mr. SNOOK. Suppose it was added in 1917?

Mr. HAWLEY. The deduction is allowed for the taxable year. It is 10 per cent of what is added in the taxable year or during any year since the close of the prewar period.

Mr. SNYDER. If it had been added in 1917, the year before, it would be in the capital.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not most likely true that if this had been an individual business the tax would be as estimated on page 87 of the report, $70,095? Has the gentleman examined that?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not compared the two.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman does not doubt that that is correct?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. HARDY. The table says that if it was an individual business it would have a tax of $70,095.

Mr. HAWLEY—

That is, if the business had been conducted by an individual the taxes paid would be—

Normal tax	$17,520
Total of taxes	70,095

Under what condition would a corporation pay the war-profits tax? Chart VIII instances a corporation paying the war-profits tax. It has invested capital, $200,000; prewar net profit, $20,000; net income for 1918, $70,000; special exemption, $3,000; total deduction, $23,000; net taxable income, $47,000.

CHART VIII.

WAR-PROFITS TAX PAID BY THE UNION FOUNDRY CORPORATION.

Data for computation of tax.

Invested capital in 1918		$200,000
Prewar profit: 1911, $18,000; 1912, $20,000; 1913, $22,000 average prewar profit		20,000
Net income for 1918		70,000
Computation of war-profits tax.
Net income for 1918		70,000
Special exemption	$3,000
Prewar average net profit	20,000
Total to be subtracted		23,000
Total amount subject to war-profits tax		47,000

Eighty per cent of $47,000 is $37,600, which is the war-profits tax.

CHART IX.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX COMPUTED ON THE UNION FOUNDRY CORPORATION.

Data for computation.

Invested capital for 1918		$200,000
Net income for 1918		70,000
Computation of tax.
Net income for 1918		70,000
Special exemption	$3,000
Eight per cent of invested capital for 1918	16,000
Total subtractions		19,000
Net amount on which normal tax is computed		51,000
Thirty-five per cent on part of net income in excess of 8 per cent and not in excess of 15 per cent of invested capital, or 7 per cent of the invested capital of $200,000 or $14,000, less $3,000 special exemption, leaving $11,000		3,850
Fifty per cent of part of net income in excess of 8 per cent and not in excess of 15 per cent of net capital, or 5 per cent of $200,000, or $10,000		5,000
Seven hundred and five or remainder of amount to be taxed, or $30,000		21,000
Total excess-profits tax		29,850

Since the war-profits tax of $37,600 is larger than the excess-profits tax of $29,850 this corporation will pay the war-profits tax.

Taking the same corporation and calculating what it will pay under the excess-profits methods: Net income, $70,000; invested $200,000. The rate of profit is 35 per cent. Net income for 1918 is $70,000; special exemption, $3,000; 8 per cent on the invested capital, $16,000; total deductions, $19,000; net taxable income, $51,000.

Computation: Thirty-five per cent on that part of the net income in excess of 8 per cent and not in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital, or 7 per cent on $200,000, or $14,000, less the $3,000 special exemption, leaves $11,000, to be taxed at the rate of 35 per cent, giving a tax in the amount of $3,850; 50 per cent on that part of the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital, or 5 per cent of $200,000, or $10,000, taxed at 50 per cent, gives a tax of $5,000; 70 per cent on the remainder of the net income of $30,000 produces a further amount of $21,000. Adding these amounts of $3,850, $5,000, and $21,000 together, we have a total excess-profits tax of $29,850. The war-profits tax is $37,600. It is evident that this corporation will pay the war-profits tax. In a general way we may say that when the difference between the earning now and in the prewar period is very great the corporation will in all probability pay under the war-profits method, but if the difference between the prewar earning and the present earning is not so great it will probably pay under the excess-profits method.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, under this war-profits tax the Government gets $37,600 plus the difference between $47,000 and $70,000, at 12 or 18 per cent.

Mr. HAWLEY. The exact amount will be shown on Chart X.

CHART X.

NORMAL TAX PAID BY THE UNION FOUNDRY CORPORATION.

Data for computing the tax.

Net income for 1918		$70,000
It pays a war-profits tax of		37,600
Net income for 1918		70,000
Special exemption	$2,000
War-profits tax	37,600
Total to be subtracted		39,600
Net amount subject to normal tax		30,400
The corporation distributes a 10 per cent dividend		20,000
It retains in the business, undistributed		10,400
Tax:
12 per cent on $20,000 distributed		2,400
18 per cent on $10,400 not distributed		1,872
Total normal tax		4,272
This corporation will therefore pay in taxes—
Normal tax		4,272
War-profits tax		37,600
Total of taxes		41,872

Or 60 per cent of its net income.

Mr. WALDOW. If this Union Foundry Corporation had made a prewar profit of $70,000, what tax would they have to pay at the present time?

Mr. HAWLEY. That would necessitate another computation, and if the gentleman will permit I would like to finish this illustration before my time expires. Taking the facts as we have them, for the Union Foundry Corporation, the net income is $70,000. It is entitled to a deduction on the war-profits tax of $37,600 and the special exemption of $2,000, which would make a total amount to be subtracted of $39,600, and leaving a taxable amount subject to the normal tax of $30,400. Suppose it distributes 10 per cent on its invested capital. Then it will pay 12 per cent on $20,000, which will be $2,400, and 18 per cent on $10,400, which is $1,872, or a total normal tax of $4,272. It pays a normal tax of $4,272 and a war-profits tax of $37,600, or a total of $41,872, or nearly 60 per cent of its net income.

Mr. SNYDER. In other words, the corporation, having made a net profit of $70,000, finds itself, after its taxes are paid, with a net profit of $28,128.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is it the actual capital or is it what is termed "capital"?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not what the economists call capital, but it is capital under a certain plan defined in the bill, certain things being included and certain things excluded. It is a statement of what may be considered as invested capital for the purposes of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. It does not make any difference what you call it, if there is that amount invested in the business, whether you call it surplus or undivided profits or capital. You take the actual amount that is invested in the business in the calendar year—for instance, 1918—after this act is passed, because that gives you the basis to compute the taxes. Am I correct?

Mr. HAWLEY. If I understand the gentleman's question, I think that is correct.

Mr. DENISON. If this corporation has a net income of $70,000 and should pay $50,000 on necessary indebtedness, would that make any difference in the tax it would have to pay?

Mr. HAWLEY. It would be allowed a deduction of 10 per cent of the amount so paid.

Mr. SNYDER. It does not apply to profit at all. You are dealing with net profit.

Mr. HAWLEY. It affects the taxable amounts.

Mr. SNYDER. After all debts and interest have been paid.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, to get back to my question, if the prewar profits of the Union Foundry Corporation were $70,000, then I take it their tax would not be found in the war-profits tax. It would have to be arrived at under the excess-profits tax.

Mr. HAWLEY. If their net income had been how much?

Mr. WALDOW. If their prewar profits had been the same as the net income for 1918.

Mr. HAWLEY. They would come under the three exceptions that I have mentioned, an illustration of which occurs earlier in my remarks. The corporation would pay under the excess-profits method.

Mr. PLATT. In estimating profits, of course, inventories are taken into consideration. There is an inventory at the beginning of the year and another at the end of the year?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The second inventory is made up of the cost price of goods on a rising market at high prices, and the profit is made up partly by subtracting the first inventory. Suppose before these goods are sold peace comes and prices go down, how are you going to save that company from bankruptcy, having paid taxes on profits it never made? In all possibility, so far as this present taxable year is concerned that will not happen. Should not there be allowances in there?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are in the bill many allowances, and there is a board to be created in the Treasury Department to determine such questions.

Mr. PLATT. It is for oil and gas, but for stocks and goods there is not anything in the bill that allows the Treasury to handle it.

Mr. HAWLEY. In order to meet the difficulty suggested by the gentlemen, inventories are taken, both at the beginning and the end of the year, for the purpose of determining what deductions are to be allowed.

Mr. PLATT. Depreciation might come very suddenly from peace.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I understand the payment of the taxes can be made in installments?

Mr. HAWLEY. They can be paid one-third the 15th of March, one-third the 15th of May, and a third the 15th of July.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will permit, my colleague [Mr. WALDOW] asked a few moments ago if the gentleman would show what the taxes upon this same concern would be had the prewar profit been $70,000. Can the gentleman give us any light on that?

Mr. HAWLEY. The corporation would pay the excess-profits tax, and not the war-profits tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand wherever the income of a corporation for the prewar period exceeds the income for the taxable year, then the corporation pays under the excess-profits method?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; but——

Mr. STAFFORD. How can it be otherwise?

Mr. HAWLEY. If the difference between the prewar period and the present profit is very large, a corporation will probably pay under the war-profits method, otherwise it will pay under the excess-profits method.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the case instanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDOW] where an income of the prewar period is $70,000 and the income for the taxable year is $70,000, how, in that case, could there be any war-profits tax at all? Would not the corporation pay under the excess-profits tax?

Mr. HAWLEY. It would, I think, pay under the excess-profits method.

Mr. STAFFORD. So, speaking generally, the corporation whose profit during the prewar period was large and in excess of the profit during the taxable year, it will necessarily pay the lesser sum under the excess-profits method?

Mr. HARDY. If the profits this year were no greater than in the prewar period, there would be no prewar profits?

Mr. HAWLEY. No——

Mr. HARDY. It would be bound to come under that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Or one of the three exceptions. Answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], if its profits in the prewar period greatly exceed its present profits, it will in all probability pay the war-profits tax.

Mr. SNYDER. I think that is a very good point to have cleared up, just the same.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then take the question of the smaller corporations, which have a taxable capital of $50,000 and under, has the gentleman any illustration of that showing——

Mr. HAWLEY. There are in the bill provisions to take care of the very small corporation, and in the time at my disposal I can not present the exceptions in full.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman has not an illustration of that?

Mr. HAWLEY. No.

The bill proposes to raise a revenue of an enormous amount. It is justifiable only, and especially as to many of its features, as a war measure. It is a mighty answer to the military domination proposed by the autocratic powers of Germany. The moneys raised under the bill will speed the spread of liberty in the world and establish upon a firm foundation the rights of men and women in the peaceful pursuit of their lives and the quiet possession of their property.

The day will come when our enemies, with their weapons grounded and their hands upraised, will ask the conquering armies of the United States and our allies in possession of our enemies' country what terms of peace we will give them. Those terms will ensure, I am confident, the future peace of the world.

I have two sons, and they have been in France for more than a year. I am confident they will return. But when they do it must be with the flag, unconquered in all preceding wars, unconquered still, and with the bugles of a humanity, redeemed from the plots of a ruler drunk with power and mad with the lust of conquest and plunder, echoing round the world the victorious strains of "The Star-spangled Banner" as a salute to the banner whose people saved them. That peace, honor, security, and liberty may prevail in the world, the event of the war awaits the "unconditional surrender" of our enemies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, under our Constitution the voters of the Nation will elect a new House of Representatives on the 5th of the coming November. In other nations elections have been postponed because of the war. In America such postponement is impossible. Surely this is an hour when the call of any political party is but feebly heard, if heard at all. The Nation calls to duty every man and woman of America. The patriot hears nothing but his country's call, and the Nation demands a higher degree of devotion than mere loyalty.

Col. W. D. Boyce, in the Saturday Blade, has exposed the utter impotence and unworthiness of the man who is merely loyal by the side of the man who is patriotic. The person who is nothing more than loyal does keep out of prison. The person who is patriotic is not only ready but willing to give all, even life itself, for his country. To call a patriot loyal is to insult him. This spirit makes our boys glad to go to the front. It makes the father who can not go wonder and feel unworthy.

Mr. Chairman, America is on fire with a fervid determination to win this war for liberty throughout the world, and in this spirit the voter will go to the ballot box in November. The announcement has been made, however, that the Republican Party organization will put forth unusual and extraordinary efforts to carry the next House of Representatives. Just why it is so essential to capture this particular House is hard to understand. Just why this unusual and determined fight is to be made is also difficult to understand, unless there is concealed a purpose to cripple the administration of Mr. Wilson. If our Republican friends capture a majority of the next House you can not write into law a single plank of your party platform. You could tie the hands of the President. You could do that and that only. A Republican friend of mine said not long ago that a Republican House would constitute a check on the administration. In what respect, I would ask, does anyone wish to place a check on this administration? Does anyone wish to check President Wilson in his determination to use every ounce of our national energy in winning the war? When war was declared Secretary Daniels made a four-word declaration which will live. "The Navy is ready," said he. Nothing had been left undone by Secretary Daniels and the splendid corps of helpers around him which it was humanly possible to do. The administration of this man has been so efficient that no man in this Chamber has spoken a word of criticism, while words of commendation have been heard on both sides of the center aisle. Does Daniels need any check?

For a while a great deal was said about the Secretary of War. You hear nothing now. Why? He has done far more than anyone dreamed was possible when war was declared. We have 1,600,000 men in France. In the face of this achievement men are hardly just to remain silent. It is a record of performance unprecedented in 6,000 years of history and tradition.

For a while the Committee on Public Information was a target of bitter criticism and even abuse. Mr. George Creel, the chairman, was the subject of bitter vituperation. When he had an opportunity to tell what he had been doing the abuse suddenly ended. His vindication was not only complete but his highly efficient and patriotic work was demonstrated beyond all question. Here is what two of our colleagues on this floor, both opposed to Mr. Creel in politics, said of his work after investigation by the Committee on Appropriations. Mr. GILLETT, of Massachusetts, the acting leader of the Republican minority and a member of the committee which investigated the work of Mr. Creel's bureau, said:

> But after examining Mr. Creel and the other members of his bureau I came to the conclusion that as far as any evidence that we could discover it had not been conducted in a partisan spirit.

And the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], recognized by all as a Republican leader on the floor, was generous enough to pay this fine tribute to Mr. Creel and his work:

> Having said this much about Mr. Creel and his past utterances, I now want to say that I believe Mr. Creel has endeavored to patriotically do his duty at the head of this bureau.
> I am of the opinion that whatever his opinions may have been or may be now that, so far as his activities in connection with this work are concerned, they have been, in the main, judicious, and that the work has been carried on for the most part in a businesslike, thoroughgoing, effective, and patriotic way. Mr. Creel has called to his assistance and placed in positions of responsibility men of a variety of political views, some of them Republicans of recognized standing. I do not believe that Mr. Creel has endeavored to influence their activities, and I do not believe there have been any activities of the bureau consciously and intentionally partisan. A great work has been done. A great work has been done by the four-minute men, 40,000 of them speaking continuously to audiences, ready-made, all over the country. A great work has been done and will be done through the medium of the picture film. A great work has been done through the medium of the publications of the bureau, which I believe can be commended and approved by every good citizen. Much remains to be done, and I believe the committee has not granted any too much money for this work. I trust the work will be carried on in a useful, helpful way. There is need of it in the future, not perhaps as much as in the past, but there is need of a continuation of the proper activities of a bureau like this, and we can not withhold the moneys necessary for such work. I am willing to leave the responsibility of saying who shall be at the head of the bureau to the President.

Mr. Chairman, unless I am grievously mistaken the people of America do not want any check put upon President Wilson or his coworkers as long as the war lasts. One great outstanding fact must not be forgotten. In this spending of billions to make the Nation ready there has been not one breath of scandal or corruption which has touched any member of the President's Cabinet, and so far as I know or have heard there has been no whisper of corruption about any man intrusted by President Wilson with the duty of expending the billions—not millions—of taxes paid by the people.

Mr. Chairman, every great measure considered by this House since the war began represents the combined work of men of both political parties. We have seen measures in charge of men on both sides of the aisle. If any check upon anybody is needed, you already have it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word more. Let every voter consider this question: Is the Nation willing to take the risk of having its action misunderstood, as it surely will be in Germany if a House of Representatives be elected for the purpose of placing a check on Woodrow Wilson? One thing is certain—no man in Germany is going to believe you intend to sustain the President if you elect a Republican House. If the people of this Nation are behind the President, they certainly can not manifest that support by electing a majority politically hostile to him in this House or in the Senate.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will yield, but I should prefer not to do so.

Mr. KEARNS. Does the gentleman think the Republican Party ought to dissipate any idea they may have of attempting to elect Republicans in the various districts?

Mr. POU. The point I am making is this: That there has been a propaganda set in motion lately that it is very necessary that this particular House of Representatives should be elected by the Republicans, and I am answering that proposal.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. POU. I decline to yield further.

In this connection I will quote from an interview which appeared in the Washington Post on September 6:

> "There will not be any great change in the Ohio delegation in the next Congress, in my opinion," said John F. Giddings, of Canton, at the Washington. "I have been a lifelong Republican, but I expect to cast my vote this year for a Democrat for Congress. I believe that if the Republicans should succeed in carrying the House this election the news would be flashed abroad that the President, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, had been repudiated by the American people. This would hearten the German official class and the German Army, and the war would as a result be continued six months or a year longer than it would otherwise, and our boys in France would be kept from returning home that much longer. There is no argument to this, and while I am for the war and for a decisive defeat of autocracy I also want our boys back home as soon as possible. Hence, I shall sustain our Commander in Chief by voting for a Democrat for Congress this fall—my first vote of the kind."

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. CANNON. After all is said and done, if the gentleman will just allow me one sentence, there has been no difference, substantially, between the support the President has received from both parties. He himself has said politics is adjourned. Now, if the gentleman is correct, that every man on the Democratic side should be returned, would it not be still further discouraging the Kaiser if every Republican in this House who has supported the President should be returned?

Mr. POU. I will say frankly that any man who has from sincere motives supported the administration is entitled to just the same credit, whether he be on this side or on that side; but the point I am making, I will say to my distinguished friend from Illinois, is this: The gentleman from Illinois knows, as we all know, that there has been what might be called a propaganda set in motion during the last 30 days that the Republican Party intends to capture the next House. Now, the point I am making is this: However that purpose may be explained here, however patriotic gentlemen may be, that is not the best way to sustain the administration.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield further just for a question?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, during the last 30 days, the last 60 days, the last 6 months, the gentlemen on that side of the House—some of them in the Senate and in the party—have said, "Vote for a Democrat; otherwise you are voting for the Kaiser." So when you talk about propaganda, to say the least of it, one can be set off against the other.

Mr. POU. Well, I am not going to undertake to debate that question with my distinguished friend from Illinois further than to repeat what I said, that we accept the challenge of our Republican friends with respect to the next House of Representatives. I would remind the gentleman that in the Spanish-American War you made the point that a Republican House was necessary to sustain the President, and you made the point under Roosevelt that if he did not have a Republican House peace negotiations might break down. Why does not the same argument hold good now?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POU. I prefer not to yield further.

As a matter of fact, if it was necessary to sustain McKinley in the Spanish-American War, if it was necessary to sustain Roosevelt when peace negotiations were going on at Portsmouth, N. H., it is ten thousand times more necessary that there be no misunderstanding as to this question now, that a majority should be sent back to this House about whose position in respect to the administration there can be no doubt or question.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for one additional question?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. CANNON. At the time the gentleman speaks of the Democratic Party was almost solid against appropriations.

Mr. POU. That is not an answer to the question now. If the Democratic Party did wrong then—and I am not saying that it did or did not—there is no reason why the Republican Party should do wrong now.

Mr. CANNON. We vote solidly for appropriations, as solidly as your side. [Applause.] You voted against appropriations then, and we vote for them now.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know John F. Giddings, but I believe this interview expresses the intention of a great many Republicans and independents. They are patriotic Americans, and they hold that they can not afford to take the risk of having the action of America misunderstood in Germany or anywhere else. As I have said, an appeal was made to sustain the lamented McKinley in the Spanish-American War. The people responded by electing a Republican Congress. An appeal was made to sustain President Roosevelt while peace negotiations were under way during the closing months of the Russian-Japanese War. Again the people responded by electing a Republican Congress. Now it is suggested that a Republican House should be elected to act as a check on President Wilson. I submit he needs no check of any kind. The people of this Nation do not wish to check or hamper the President in any way whatever, and there is no denying the statement made by this Ohio Republican that there is a risk in electing a Republican House—the risk of having the national purpose misunderstood.

In this hour it would be in poor taste to praise the President. I, for one, am proud to follow him. I was with him in the beginning, and, if I am living, I will be with him to the end. To-day there are a few names on the tongues of every child who is taught anything of American history—Washington, Lincoln, and a few others. The child student of history of the next generation, not only in America but throughout the civilized Christian world, will add to these the name of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Nation called him in the supreme hour of the world's history, and the world will give him a place with the immortal few who served faithfully and unselfishly in shaping the destiny of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire, first of all, to compliment the chairman and the members of the Ways and Means Committee on their work in the formation of this bill. Confronted with an unprecedented task, the framing of a revenue measure which shall raise by taxation $8,000,000,000, an amount larger than was ever before imposed on this or any other nation either in peace or war, they have with patience and diligence labored long and efficiently in its preparation. The result is creditable to them and to the House. I doubt if a better drafted revenue bill, or one more comprehensive and harmonious was ever before presented to the American Congress.

This does not mean that the bill as presented is not subject to criticism. Both in some of the provisions which it contains and in matters omitted it might be improved. But in general and as a whole it should meet with approval and support. Doubtless in its course through Congress amendments will be made which will improve the bill; but I predict that in its main features it will be little changed when it is finally passed.

The estimates of the departments for the next fiscal year require preparation to meet an expenditure of $24,000,000,000. The committee in approval of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury has adopted the policy of raising one-third of the amount of the total expenditures by taxation and two-thirds by bond issues, or $8,000,000,000 by taxation and $16,000,000,000 by bond issues. This is a larger proportion of taxation than has been adopted by any other country engaged in the war. Great Britain has so far financed her war expenditures by a proportion of about 25 per cent taxation and 75 per cent bonds. The other countries have imposed a still less proportion of taxes. However, it does not seem apparent that for this country at this time the proportion of taxation proposed is excessive.

Following the recommendation of the President the committee has provided for the revenue demanded chiefly by increasing the taxes on incomes, excess or war profits, luxuries and semiluxuries. There will be few who will controvert the wisdom of such action. The burden is thus placed most largely on those best able to bear it. This will more fully appear by a brief analysis of the bill.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

The committee has divided the bill into 14 general titles, as follows:

1. General definitions.
2. Income tax on individuals and corporations.
3. War-profits and excess-profits tax.
4. Estate tax.
5. Tax on transportation, insurance, etc.
6. Tax on beverages.
7. Tax on cigars, tobacco, etc.
8. Tax on admissions and dues.
9. Excise taxes.
10. Special taxes.
11. Stamp taxes.
12. Advisory tax board.
13. General administrative provisions.
14. General provisions.

The first title contains specific definitions of the terms used in the bill. It is unnecessary to include them in this analysis.

INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAXES.

Existing income taxes have been increased throughout the schedule. Under the law of 1916 a normal tax of 2 per cent was levied on all incomes, but an exemption was given to a head of a family or married person of $4,000 and to an unmarried person of $3,000. Under the law of 1917 a like normal tax of 2 per cent was levied, but the exemption was reduced to $2,000 for a married and $1,000 for an unmarried person. Under the present bill the exemption remains the same as in the law of 1917, but the normal tax is increased to 6 per cent on the first $4,000 and is 12 per cent above that amount.

In addition to the increase in the normal tax on incomes increases in the form of surtaxes have been made on the larger incomes ranging from 2 to 65 per cent.

The following table shows the income tax and surtax under the law of 1917 and as proposed in the pending bill, an exemption of $2,000 as for a married person being deducted:

Incomes.	Tax under—
	Existing law.	Proposed bill.

$500,000	192,680	297,095
$1,000,000	475,180	647,095
$5,000,000	3,140,180	3,527,095

An exemption of $200 is also allowed for each dependent child under 18 years of age.

A partnership as such is not liable to the income tax, but each partner will be required to pay an income tax upon his share of the partnership profits. Every person, including minors, must make a return if in receipt of a net income of $1,000 if single or $2,000 if married.

Upon figures furnished by the Treasury Department it is shown that about 615,000 persons have taxable incomes of over $4,000 per annum and 2,440,000 have taxable incomes of $4,000 or less. It is estimated that on the rates provided in this bill the individual normal income tax will yield $414,000,000 and the surtaxes $1,068,186,000, or a total from this source of $1,482,186,000.

CORPORATION INCOME TAXES.

Under the revenue law of 1916 the normal corporation tax was 2 per cent upon the net income. Under the act of 1917 it was 4 per cent. Under the present bill it is fixed at 18 per cent. But it is provided that the rate shall be only 12 per cent upon such amount as does not exceed the dividends paid during the taxable year and the amount paid in discharge of bonds or other obligations outstanding. A credit is allowed all corporations in the sum of $2,000. Credit is also allowed for the amount received as interest on bonds and the amount paid as a war or excess-profits tax.

The net income of corporations for the current taxable year is estimated by the Treasury Department to be $10,000,000,000. The amount subject to taxation will be about $6,300,000,000. The total revenue estimated from corporation income taxes will be $894,000,000.

WAR-PROFITS AND EXCESS-PROFITS TAXES.

These taxes are not imposed on individuals but only on corporations, including voluntary associations and joint-stock companies. Every corporation having a net income of $3,000 or more must make a return.

Two methods of imposing these taxes are provided—one, a tax on war profits, and the other a tax on excess profits. Both will not be imposed, but the Government has the option of imposing that method which will yield the greater revenue.

On corporations having an invested capital of not more than $25,000 neither an excess nor war-profits tax shall exceed 35 per cent of the net income in excess of $3,000. On corporations with an invested capital of more than $25,000, but not more than $50,000, the amount of the tax shall not exceed 40 per cent.

War-profits taxes are imposed on corporations upon the following basis: The average net income of corporations for the prewar period embracing the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 is taken as a basis. The bill provides a tax of 80 per cent upon the amount of net income of the taxable year in excess of the average for the prewar period. Each corporation is allowed a specific exemption of $3,000. If a corporation was not in existence during the prewar period, or if its prewar earnings were less than 10 per cent, it is allowed an exemption of 10 per cent in addition to the specific exemption of $3,000.

Excess-profits taxes are imposed upon the following basis: A credit is given each corporation of $3,000, and in addition each corporation is allowed a further exemption of 8 per cent of the invested capital for the taxable year. On the excess profits above these exemptions a tax is imposed of 35 per cent of the net income on the amount above the exemptions and not in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital, 50 per cent on the amount in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 20 per cent, and 70 per cent in excess of 20 per cent.

No one will dispute the justice of taxing heavily the large profits made by certain corporations growing out of war contracts. The war-profits tax is based upon that proposition. The bill establishes a prewar standard, allows the corporation whatever profits it was then making, and if the corporation is now making more it is assumed that it is because of war conditions and the excess is taxed 80 per cent. The tax is large, but is certainly justified.

It was found that certain corporations were making excessive profits both during the prewar period and also during the war. The excess-profits method was adopted in order to reach such cases. No form of taxation is more just than one which prevents in war time excessive profits. The committee is to be commended for providing both methods, so that no profiteer shall escape.

It is estimated that the amount that will be received from these taxes will be $3,200,000,000.

ESTATE TAX.

This tax is a graduated tax upon the devolution of the net estate of a decedent. The tax was first imposed by the revenue act of 1916 and was continued in the act of 1917. Some changes have been made in the present bill, most of which are manifest improvements. Increases in the rates have been imposed. Under existing law the rates range from 2 to 25 per cent. Under the present bill they run from 3 to 40 per cent.

TRANSPORTATION AND INSURANCE.

The present rate of 3 per cent on the amount paid for transportation of freight is continued in the present bill.

The present rate of 1 cent for every 20 cents or fraction thereof on express is also continued.

Eight per cent, the amount now imposed on passenger rates, is also retained.

The 10 per cent now charged on Pullman rates is reduced to 8 per cent, in order to make it uniform with passenger rates.

The bill provides a tax of 5 cents on each telegraph or telephone message on which the charge is more than 14 cents and not more than 50 cents; and a tax of 10 cents on all messages on which the charge is above 50 cents.

The tax now imposed of 8 cents on every $100 on life insurance policies is continued. On fire insurance, 1 cent on the dollar of the premium charged is imposed.

TAX ON BEVERAGES.

The tax on distilled spirits for beverage purposes has been increased from $3.20 to $8 per gallon; and on spirits to be used for manufacturing purposes from $2.20 to $4.40.

On all other beverages, except soft drinks, the rates under existing law are doubled.

The tax on soft drinks is 30 per cent levied upon the manufacturers', producers', or importers' selling price of cereal beverages, and of 20 per cent on all other soft drinks. The tax on ice cream, sodas, and other similar articles is 2 cents for each 10 cents on the sale price. In case of sales of 7 cents or less the tax is 1 cent.

The estimated revenue from spirits will be $806,600,000, and from fermented liquors $240,000,000. The total tax on beverages is expected to amount to $1,137,600,000. This estimate will be greatly reduced if contemplated prohibitory legislation is enacted.

TAX ON CIGARS AND TOBACCO.

The existing taxes on cigars, cigarettes, tobacco, snuff, and so forth, have been greatly increased. The taxes imposed on this class of articles under the act of 1916 amounted to $155,000,000. Under the act of 1917 the amount collected was $212,000,000. Under the operation of the present bill the estimated amount will be $341,000,000.

TAX ON ADMISSIONS AND DUES.

The present tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents paid for admission to theaters, "movies," shows, and other places of amusement has been increased to 2 cents. If the admission is 7 cents or less the tax is 1 cent. An additional tax is imposed on tickets sold at news stands, hotels, and so forth.

The present tax of 10 per cent on the amount paid as dues or membership fees to any social, athletic, or sporting club is increased to 20 per cent when such amount is in excess of $10.

EXCISE TAXES.

The committee in stating the method employed in the laying of this class of taxes report they endeavored to select for taxation articles which in themselves were considered luxuries, and those which when sold for a large price might fairly be deemed luxuries.

Increases are made on articles now taxed, and new excise taxes are also imposed. On automobiles the tax to be paid by the manufacturer when sold is increased from 3 to 10 per cent. On piano players, phonographs, jewelry, cameras, and sporting goods a like increase is made.

On pianos, pipe organs, clocks, candy, tapestries, slot machines, furs, yachts, paintings, statuary, and so forth, a tax of 10 per cent is placed. Pistols and revolvers are taxed 25 per cent; dirks, bowie knives, and daggers, 100 per cent. A tax of 2 cents per gallon is levied on gasoline.

A 20 per cent tax is imposed on carpets and rugs, on the amount of the sale price in excess of $5 per square yard; picture frames in excess of $10; umbrellas and parasols in excess of $4; men's suits and overcoats in excess of $50; women's suits and cloaks in excess of $50; women's hats in excess of $15; men's hats in excess of $5; boots and shoes in excess of $10; men's hose in excess of $1; women's stockings in excess of $2. Other articles of similar character are subject to a sale price tax. Sales price taxes shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor and shall be paid by him to the Government.

SPECIAL TAXES.

In selecting special tax sources the committee endeavored to select such objects as would yield considerable revenue and be fairly well distributed.

The tax on corporations is increased from 50 cents for each $1,000 exceeding $99,000 to $1 for each $1,000 exceeding $5,000. Brokers' tax is increased from $30 to $100; on theaters the tax is doubled, and ranges from $50 to $200; circuses, increased $100 to $200; billiard rooms, increased from $5 to $10 for each table. Special taxes are also placed on liquor dealers and manufacturers of cigars and tobacco. A special tax on the use of automobiles is imposed; on 23 horsepower or less $10, 23 to 30 horsepower $20, 30 to 40 horsepower $30, more than 40 horsepower $50.

STAMP TAXES.

The present stamp-tax law is reenacted except that an increase from 7 to 8 cents per package is placed on playing cards.

In this brief analysis of the bill I have not endeavored to go into details. Members of the House will consult the text of the bill for provisions relating to administration. They will also consult the text to understand the effect of the many definitions, exceptions, and conditions contained in the bill. For this purpose the able report of the committee accompanying the bill and the published reports of the hearings will also be available.

ADVISORY TAX BOARD.

The bill wisely provides for the creation of an advisory tax board to pass upon cases which may be referred to it by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Cases are constantly arising involving in many instances large sums of money in which hearings are necessary to ascertain and determine questions of fact and law. This board will sit as a court on these questions and recommend the appropriate findings to the determining officers. The board is to consist of five members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES.

In this connection it is proper to state that it is a matter to be regretted that the committee did not also provide for the creation of a joint committee, composed of Members of the Senate and House, on expenditures. Congress is imposing unprecedented taxes upon the people and appropriating immense sums for carrying on the war and is making no attempt to see whether the money is expended as designed and is providing no safeguards against extravagance and waste. Money provided is turned over to officials whose primary thought is speedy accomplishment. That object is commendable, but without supervision leads to needless and reckless extravagance.

Other nations act more wisely than we. Great Britain has a committee of Parliament on expenditures composed of 20 members. They are divided into various subcommittees and are required to report from time to time. In this country we have no congressional supervision of expenditures. Only in flagrant cases, where the loss is so great as to be brought to the attention of Congress, is any investigation made. In the aircraft investigation it was shown by the report of the Senate committee that the immense sum of $640,000,000 appropriated by Congress to provide our Army with aeroplanes was almost entirely wasted on unnecessary expenditures and fruitless experiments. In the Hog Island case money was squandered with a reckless extravagance never before equaled even in this country. The cost-plus system so generally adopted is an incentive to extravagance and has led to the loss of millions. The practice of the various departments of the Government of bidding against each other for the same material is indefensible. These things could be at least measurably remedied by a strict supervision of expenditures. The very fact that a committee is in existence whose duty it is to examine into the manner in which appropriations are expended would have a salutary effect.

We are a rich Nation and can spend more money than any other and can raise it more easily. But there is a limit to even our ability. And we are not justified in spending a single dollar of the people's money needlessly. It is no justification or excuse to say that extravagance and waste are the necessary incidents of every war. Even if that were true, it is still our duty to use every means at our command to make the amount of extravagance and waste as small as possible. It is to be hoped that before this bill reaches its final passage a nonpartisan committee on expenditures may be added to its provisions.

REVENUE FROM CUSTOMS DUTIES.

The omission by the committee to include in a bill for increasing revenue increases on duties on imports is important and remarkable. From the earliest period of our history customs dues have formed an important part of our revenue. Now they are at the lowest rate in our history, the amount received is comparatively very small, and yet there is no provision in this bill to increase our revenue from this source.

Other countries engaged in the war have greatly increased their revenue from this source during the war period. Great Britain has more than doubled her revenue received from the tariff since the war began.

Revenue from customs duties of Great Britain.

1913	$182,000,000
1914	190,000,000
1915	266,000,000
1916	397,000,000
1917	418,000,000

It is estimated that the total receipts for 1918 will be about $460,000,000.

In 1916 Great Britain imposed new duties of 33⅓ per cent on motor cars, bicycles, musical instruments, clocks, watches, and so forth. New duties and large increases—in many instances doubled—were imposed on sugar, canned fruit, condensed milk, cocoa, coffee, chicory, matches, and so forth. Her present revenue derived from customs is about $10.22 per capita of her population.

Under existing laws in the United States our revenue from customs duties is constantly decreasing while the amount of our imports is continually increasing.

Revenue from customs duties in United States.

Year.	Amount of imports.	Duties collected.	Ad valorem rate.
			Per cent.
1913	$1,813,000,000	$312,000,000	18
1914	1,893,000,000	283,000,000	15
1915	1,674,000,000	205,000,000	12
1916	2,197,000,000	209,000,000	9
1917	2,659,000,000	221,000,000	8
1918	3,000,000,000	180,000,000	6

With our present imports upon the basis of the tariff rate of 1913, our revenue from that source would be for the current year $540,000,000 instead of $180,000,000. With an estimated population of 110,000,000, our revenue from the tariff is $1.63 per capita as compared with $10.22 received by Great Britain.

The proposition to increase our revenue from tariff duties is not and should not be considered a political question at this time. Protectionists and free traders, so called, both understand that the question is now primarily a question of revenue. Protectionists stand for revenue and protection. Free traders stand for a tariff for revenue only. Protectionists do not demand and do not expect a general revision of the tariff in accordance with their views at this time. They have always maintained that revenue was a necessary element in the fixing of tariff schedules. They have also maintained that protection of our agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests was a necessary element. They do not, however, believe it wise at this time to insist on the element of protection being considered. That will come up for consideration and action at the close of the war. But both protectionists and free traders agree on a tariff for revenue, and it is difficult to understand why the committee should ignore a source of revenue which has always been used during our own history and which is being used by other nations at this time. It is difficult to understand why our tariff, which is now lower in amount than it has been for many years, which is lower in percentage than ever before in the history of the Nation, and which is lower than that of any other great nation at this time, should not have been increased for purely revenue purposes.

With a revenue from the tariff less than has been received for 20 years, there is no effort made to increase it, notwithstanding our demand for revenue is greater than it ever was before. Searching for every available source, we entirely ignore this most easily imposed, most cheaply collected, and most lightly borne of all sources of revenue.

It is probably too late to remedy the difficulty now, but if further revenue is required it would appear most unwise to neglect this easily to be obtained source.

However large the amount of taxes imposed by this bill, and however great the burden imposed, it will be accepted as justifiable and necessary. We are not only the richest Nation in the world in accumulated wealth, but our resources and productive capacity are so marvelously great that we will meet this or any other demand for the successful prosecution of the war without serious injury or great sacrifice. It will only need a reduction of our always extravagant expenditures, it will only demand a cutting off of needless luxuries, it will only require a check on waste and overindulgence to meet this or any further demands the Government may make upon us.

And if it should embarrass us or even seriously burden us financially, what is that compared with the service and sacrifice we require of those we send across the seas. They must give up their positions, they must abandon their careers, they must go to hardship, discomfort, disease, and even death to serve their country in this the hour of its need. However great our burden, it does not reach the height nor depth of their sacrifice.

It is to help and protect and bring back safely our boys, our loved ones, our protectors, that these taxes are imposed. It is only fair and just to them that the richest Nation on earth should see that they shall be the best fed, the best clothed, the best equipped, the best cared for of all the soldiers engaged in this war. It is to bring about and insure this condition now and until final victory that this legislation is designed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made on the floor of this House that one John F. Giddings, a Republican, of Canton, Ohio, has been reported in the press as saying that he believes it would bring joy in Berlin if the next Congress should be Republican. It is reported in the press that John F. Giddings has been a lifelong and influential Republican, living in the city of Canton, Ohio.

John F. Giddings's name does not appear in the city directory of Canton, and there appears no name similar to that. Any person by the name of John F. Giddings is absolutely unknown in the city of Canton, Ohio.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the name that was referred to in one of the speeches just made on the floor?

Mr. KEARNS. That was the name given in the speech just made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] a few moments ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], a member of the committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in his opening address to the House on Friday, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee expressed his appreciation of the work of the members of the committee in framing this revenue bill, especially speaking of the patriotic and nonpartisan attitude of the members which brought about a unanimous report. There were, naturally, differences of opinion expressed, many arguments used pro and con, but underlying it all two factors, to my view, were conspicuous in bringing about the result to which the chairman referred. One he has himself mentioned, and the other his modesty would deter him from mentioning, even if he realized how important it was. As a junior minority member of this great committee, it may not be out of place for me to say that the additional factor in the unanimous report was the personal courtesy, invariable good nature, willingness to patiently hear every member, and the entire fairness of the distinguished chairman. [Applause.] I feel this word is due him in the opening of my remarks.

FOUNDATION FOR THE BILL.

On May 27 President Wilson delivered the address before the Congress, as the result of which the Ways and Means Committee promptly took up the preparation of this bill. I quote from his address:

> Enormous loans freely spent in the stimulation of industry of almost every sort produce inflations and extravagances which presently make the whole economic structure questionable and insecure and the very basis of credit is cut away. Only fair, equitably distributed taxation, of the widest incidence and drawing chiefly from the sources which would be likely to demoralize credit by their very abundance, can prevent inflation and keep our industrial system free of speculation and waste. We shall naturally turn, therefore, I suppose, to war profits and incomes and luxuries for the additional taxes.

A study of the bill will show that the committee has carefully followed his suggestions, endeavoring as far as possible to lay this enormous burden along the line which the President himself mapped out. The Secretary of the Treasury, both in the letter he transmitted to the committee and in his testimony before it, gave similar advice, and while the committee endeavored to exercise its own judgment, it realized that the Treasury suggestions were well deserving of most careful consideration. This bill does not change the law for exemption of small incomes and does not impose taxes upon the absolute necessaries of life. It is fair to say that this enormous burden falls almost entirely upon those who have accumulated and been successful. It is a tax on wealth and success. The exigencies of the times seem to justify the adoption at the present time of this method.

The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Leffingwell, in the course of his statement, draws attention to the fact that we may be approaching the point where certain rates of taxes might destroy business itself or the principal on which the tax is levied. Certainly this danger point must be avoided, and it has been the studious effort of the committee to avoid this very trouble. In order to secure these enormous returns, there must be a stability of principal. There must even be an allowance of an increase of principal or capital. We must not only not encroach on principal in levying a tax, but we must go further and stabilize large capital. In other words, we must not destroy the confidence of the investor that a fair return may be secured upon his investment and that the principal itself will not be destroyed or confiscated.

PATRIOTIC TAXATION.

Many criticisms of the bill have been offered. It is proper that they should be, and when founded on thorough knowledge and information the criticisms are naturally welcomed, that corrections may, if needed, be made.

A popular tax is an unknown quantity, and when we levy the largest tax ever known in history as the rate and amount levied increase we naturally are running in absolutely the opposite direction from likes or dislikes which make for popularity. It is probably true this bill is bound to be unpopular in direct proportion to the amount of tax levied. But that is of slight consequence. If any such tax as this should be dreamed of for ordinary affairs of the Government, it would be likely to cause an uprising, provided even such an act received favorable action by Congress.

But these are not ordinary times any more than this is an ordinary tax bill. It is not a question of popularity; it is a question of patriotism. It is a question of providing the sinews for the best support we can render to our Army and Navy.

The American people will gladly permit their pocketbooks to be hard hit and their pursestrings absolutely untied in order that the men who compose our Army and Navy may have the necessary equipment for doing their work quickly and well. In addition to this, they will have the feeling of moral support that the people have willingly responded to the necessary taxation.

INDUSTRIAL RESOURCES.

In his opening remarks the chairman of the committee, Mr. KITCHIN, said, in substance, that if every bit of the resources of the country should be taken in the support of the war to its close the recuperative power of the country was so great that we would rise from the blow and again become the powerful and wealthy Nation we were at the beginning of the war. I heartily indorse this view. A meager sacrifice is asked of us in the form of dollars when compared with the supreme sacrifice of the men in khaki daily offering their lives on the battle field. Let the tax collector take our all, that victory may sooner come to the Stars and Stripes and that fewer lives be sacrificed in obtaining it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the State which I in part represent, and of which I am the only member on the Ways and Means Committee, has very large industries. Under all the tax titles in the bill Massachusetts, in proportion to its population, will undoubtedly pay a very large share. Other New England States have correspondingly large industries affected by this bill. The patriotic spirit displayed by the persons in control of those industries in the present emergency is a source of great pride. They ask that the industries should not be unduly penalized in order that they may continue to do their part both in furnishing necessary material as well as their part of the money required by the Government's stupendous operations. If a way could be found to secure the needed revenue without resorting to the high rates established by this bill, no one would be more gratified than myself, in view of the interests of the section which I represent.

TARIFF AND CONSUMPTION TAX.

There are two possibilities of additional revenue not included in this bill. One is the tariff, which it is estimated might return several hundred millions. Should this method of securing additional revenue be brought up for serious consideration it would undoubtedly bring on a partisan debate, as the tariff has so long been one of the chief points of difference between the two great political parties. As we are endeavoring in every way to avoid partisanship in and out of Congress to-day, this would, to my mind, be unfortunate. The other alternative is laying a consumption tax, perhaps more unpopular than any other form of taxation. A sales tax and a consumption tax are of the same nature and would reach rich and poor alike. The President could not have had a sales tax in mind when he addressed Congress on May 27. It certainly can be said that a consumption tax is an easy tax to lay and would be productive of large revenue. It will reach more directly to the masses than any other form contained in the present bill. In this particular it has one feature to commend it, namely, it quite likely would be a means of impressing on the minds of the people the absolute need of the strictest economy in all details of our daily life.

It is hoped that the actual revenue secured under this act will be more than the estimates made by the Treasury experts, but should it prove otherwise a consumption tax is the only alternative we see in view. We have carefully avoided including a consumption tax, not that the masses are not willing to pay their proportionate part, but because we were able to place fair burdens on those best able to carry them.

I have, however, sufficient faith in the individual patriotism of our 110,000,000 people to be confident that should Congress find there is need of a limited consumption tax the people will accept it as uncomplainingly as they have other sacrifices so far found necessary in the conduct of the war.

PROPORTION OF TAXES AND BONDS.

In view of the very complete analysis of the bill made by the chairman and supplemented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and other members of the committee, it is not my purpose to take the time of the House to deal with many specific items.

I quote from the chairman's report the following:

In determining our fiscal policy for financing the war, the first question that must be determined is, What per cent of our total expenditures shall be financed by taxation and what per cent by bonds? Your committee has determined the proportion of the cost of the war that should be financed by taxation and by bonds, not upon the basis of previous experience, for there is no analogy in history, but upon a careful consideration of the effect of the fiscal policy upon the morale of the people, upon the inflation of prices, upon production, and with reference to the relative ability of the people to pay taxes now and after the war.

* * * * * * *

At the beginning of the preparation of the new measure your committee accepted the fiscal policy suggested by the Secretary as sound and determined to prepare a new revenue bill that would raise during a 12-month period $8,000,000,000. In making the decision to recommend that one-third of the expenditures for the current fiscal year be raised by taxes and two-thirds from the sale of bonds, your committee has been guided by conditions existing at the present time. While your committee makes this recommendation for the current year it realized that no fixed policy as to the relation of taxes to bonds for the future can be determined at this time, and that the amount that should be raised by taxation in any given year must necessarily be determined after due consideration is given to business and financial conditions existing in such year. Your committee further adopted the policy that so far as practicable the $8,000,000,000 should be raised from taxes on incomes, excess and war profits, and luxuries and semiluxuries.

I heartily subscribe to this view of the chairman. In times like these, where there is almost daily expansion of needs and where conditions are so constantly changing, it is very essential that the people and Congress both thoroughly understand that this bill only carries with it the present opinion of the committee as to the proper proportions between bonds and taxes.

Tax assessment must be based on ability to pay without such hardship as may endanger principal. We are convinced that the proportion we have made is a proper one and that the American people to-day are willing and stand ready to pay the assessments levied under this bill for the necessary prosecution of the war. In this connection I desire to read extracts from an editorial of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican under date of September 5:

REVENUE BILL AND WAR TAXES.

Happily the new war revenue bill is a nonpartisan measure, having behind it in the House a unanimous report by the Ways and Means Committee. It is encouraging, too, from the viewpoint of those administrative officials who desire its early enactment, that the bill embodies no new principles of taxation.

* * * * * * *

The people's pride in the fact that this is by far the largest amount ever raised by taxation by any nation in any year of recorded time may be tinged with melancholy when the Government comes after the money. Yet there is sound economic justification for raising one-third of the estimated expenditures of the year by tax levies, the remaining $16,000,000,000 to be raised by public loans. Heavy taxation now, even to the limit of the Nation's ability to endure it, must lighten the burden of the public debt after the war; it must also have the effect of minimizing the evils of rising prices and credit inflation during the war. "Pay as you go" is a sound principle of war finance, in so far as it can be applied, especially in a country that has not the least expectation of profiting by conquests or war indemnities. Taxation of the severity now contemplated, bearing heavily on the larger incomes and profits, is best for the poorer classes in the end, for they are spared to a substantial degree the evils of excessive war loans and it might be of excessive issues of paper money.

Our bond issues will continue so long as the war lasts, but it is to be remembered that whatever political or class issues they raise after the war, relative to taxation for the heavy interest charges, the present war taxation is keeping down the amount of bonded debt which the Nation must carry for years after the war ends. The present revenue bill before Congress, requiring the collection of $8,000,000,000 this year—all money that will never have to be paid back—is in the most practical aspect of the case the most justifiable kind of war finance. It should, finally, have the effect of making the people more careful to check extravagance, to eliminate waste, to be thrifty and calculating in expenditure. For with these taxes in sight they must know what is coming to them.

The internal-revenue statistics readily show large increase in profits in certain lines of industry over the prewar period. There can be no logical or sound argument why these profits, directly resulting from the war, should not bear the heaviest burden of payment for the war. The choice of method, whether under the title of excess profits or war profits, will naturally aid the Government in securing the larger amount of taxation. What proportion might be proper as between bonds and taxes at some future time is not a consideration to-day. The people have the ability to pay at the present time, and it is on that principle that the committee has made the division in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Those in favor of larger bond issues and lower taxation fail to comprehend the tremendous payments that will be required of future generations. As has already been shown, the interest charges alone will in the future be more than the entire expenses of the Government prior to the war. Then, too, history proves the prediction that following a war there is sure to come business depression. We therefore must not burden the future with too heavy a load. It is a sound financial doctrine that having to-day the ability to pay, we should meet as large a proportion of the obligation on a "pay-as-you-go" basis as possible.

Personally, I should have preferred to have seen the original rate of normal tax decided upon by the committee left in the bill. The normal tax in the act of 1916 was 2 per cent; in the act of 1917 2 per cent more was added, making the total 4 per cent; and we now have tripled that total, making it 12 per cent, which is a very large increase. I do not think it would have been considered necessary were it not that the higher the rate of the normal tax, the more the advantage to be secured in the purchase of the fourth and approaching issue of liberty bonds, which are not subject to the normal tax.

EFFECT OF HIGH TAX RATES ON CAPITAL.

I desire to further refer to the possibility of destroying capital in high tax rates. We can only try out this problem, hoping we have not overstepped the limit either in dealing with individual incomes or corporations. The higher brackets leave a sufficiently wide margin from income for personal needs of individuals and their families, while both in the excess-profits and war-profits schedules the percentages left to large business corporations seem ample for business needs. In one schedule we actually take capital, and it is a source of considerable debate whether in taxation capital itself should be taken or confiscated. I refer to the estate tax. Rates in this schedule run from 3 to 40 per cent, with an allowance of $50,000. This tax will be particularly hard on estates in Massachusetts. In the first place, there are in Massachusetts and New England many very large fortunes, not of mushroom growth of war industries but conservative business growth and accumulation, extending through one or more generations in a family. Such form of tax as is levied against these estates should rightly accrue to the State rather than to the Federal Government, but recognizing the prior claim of the Government, this fact must be overlooked.

We have in our State an inheritance tax, as well as corporation, partnership, and income taxes, in many respects supplementing the taxes in this bill. The net estate of a citizen of Massachusetts of over five millions, according to appraisal, would be taxed on that amount at the rate of 30 per cent, or one and one-half millions. The State levies its tax on the appraisal, which would be five millions, rather than the three and one-half millions available or actually in the hands of the executors. This would add a very large proportionate rate to the tax, with nearly one-third of the capital taken from the appraisal. Another feature particularly hard is on the educational and charitable institutions abounding in New England, and especially in Massachusetts. This bill does not exempt bequests or residuary estates left to such institutions. Education will therefore suffer and charitable institutions be deprived of amounts intended by the legatee for the direct benefit of their bounty. I might add that the inheritance tax in Massachusetts specifically exempts "charitable, educational, or religious societies or institutions, and trusts for charitable purposes to be carried out in Massachusetts."

EXEMPTION OF SOLDIERS' ESTATES.

There is still another very deserving exemption from the estate tax which should be proposed. The estates of men who die in the service ought not to be subject to this tax. They have made the supreme sacrifice, and those whom they leave behind ought to be allowed to receive the full benefit of such property as the men in the service may have been possessed of.

MASSACHUSETTS INCOME TAX.

Within the past three years Massachusetts has passed a comparatively high income tax both on earned and unearned incomes, and with a very great increase both in the normal and surtaxes under this bill the income tax upon citizens of Massachusetts will be a particularly high one. It would almost seem to me that a marked revision in the statutes of the State will be essential as a result of the passage of this bill, but in what way the State can change its laws and meet its obligations is a difficult problem for its tax experts and legislators to solve. It is additionally difficult in view of the enormous increase in all forms of municipal expenses. The State has never flinched in its full duty and will not now, either in bearing its burdens of taxation or providing its best men for military service. The records of the Army overseas and the conduct of the New England divisions are significant evidence of the important part the Bay State is ever ready to play in the Nation's welfare.

TAX ON ADVERTISING.

I desire to call attention to one omission in the special taxes, and which I hope will be corrected when the bill is before us for amendment. This, in proportion to the total amounts secured under the bill, will seem somewhat trivial, but as special taxes have been laid wherever there seemed to be proper reason therefor the item to which I desire to call attention is worthy of consideration.

A very large business has grown up throughout the country of outdoor advertising. This takes the form of enormous billboards and electric signs, and also advertisements in street cars. Every year we see an increase in this development. There is hardly an available spot which can attract attention from car windows of a railway train or along a highway which is not plastered with the announcement of the kind of pills you should take, the tires you should buy, or the theaters you should attend, or other similar gratuitous advice. No important street of a city at night is free from electric devices, some of them almost making one dizzy with whirligig movements, giving similar suggestions. No street car is complete that is not similarly labeled. This is a proper business enterprise, but it is at the same time a suitable source of taxation for the Government. Several million dollars could be secured from this source without injury to the business itself.

It is argued as there is no tax on newspaper or magazine advertising there should not be on this form. These interests have been hard hit by the adoption of the zone system, which is of itself a tax. Further, I maintain the class of advertising I am referring to differs from newspaper or periodical advertising in that all but blind people are forced to see it whether they so desire or not, whereas when printer's ink is used you need not read "ads and all" unless you so desire.

Attention may rightly be called to the simplification of the revenue acts by combining the acts of 1916 and 1917 with this bill. Such an act must necessarily be considerably complicated and difficult to understand, but those who will have occasion to study its provisions will, I am sure, be gratified to find that practically all the provisions of the revenue acts to date are within the covers of this bill.

The hearings before the committee were very full and complete, and certainly the chairman of the committee gave all volunteers every opportunity to present their views. If any criticism was to be offered it might be said that the representatives of the largest business interests in the country did not seem disposed to lay their views before us as freely as we would have liked. The committee itself, to my mind, overlooked one line of inquiry that might have produced some interesting facts.

EXTRAVAGANT EXPENDITURES.

Efforts were made at various times to secure witnesses of the kind to which I refer, but without success. We should have directed a line of inquiry toward excessive war profits on Government contracts. It is very apparent that in the hasty construction of some of the cantonments and camps and in governmental supplies enormous profits have been made. There are men in the service and civilians who could have thrown light on this situation. Occasional light has been thrown, as, for instance, the expenditure of a large part of $640,000,000 appropriated for airplanes with no practical results. Added to this was the apparent effort to deceive the people by sending broadcast illustrations of a kind of plane not intended to rise from the ground and used merely by students first learning to operate machines. These planes bear the title of Penguin, and were represented as at an American aviation field in France. As early as March 28 the statement was made throughout the country that "aeroplane bodies, such as those pictured, are ready for shipment to France, though hundreds have already been shipped and thousands upon thousands will soon follow."

There are two things the American public will not stand for. One is deception in matters pertaining to the war and the welfare of our men. The other is unnecessary extravagance. We may be prodigal in expenditure, possibly even lavish, but we will demand results. Extravagance combined with no results will not be permitted. Such inquiries as I am referring to might have brought information going to show that certain of the largest appropriations could have been somewhat reduced. This is only supposition, as we were not able to have the witnesses before us. It seems to me it would have been wise to have instituted such an inquiry for two purposes, either to have found that there are people more anxious to be profiteers than patriots or proven them to have been truly patriots.

A UNITED COUNTRY.

Mr. Chairman, the men in the service are the ones performing the highest duties and exhibiting the greatest patriotism. The women of the country, the mothers, the sisters, the wives, the sweethearts, the daughters are a solid phalanx behind the lines. Their sacrifices and their works have placed their sex on a high pinnacle. The men of affairs, whose duty is here rather than "over there," have added to the unity of effort and purpose of our entire people. The executive and legislative branches of the Government but supplement the wishes of the people in the harmonious effort we are making for our country's success.

This bill represents the best thought and study of the Ways and Means Committee. No member, from the respected chairman to the lowest minority member, would claim perfection for it; but if it will produce the required revenue, if it will aid in the successful prosecution of the war, if it will hasten by one day victory for our colors, if it will provide a better equipment either in arms or supplies for our Army and Navy, if it will save the life of one boy overseas, if it will ameliorate the suffering of a wounded soldier, if it will benefit the families of those who have made the supreme sacrifice, the people of the country will stand back of the Congress in the passage of this act and will say, "Here are our eight billions of revenue; we give it to you willingly; use it judiciously, and when expended, if more is needed, come again." Patriotism and victory for Uncle Sam are to-day synonymous terms in the hearts of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert certain extracts and quotations to which I referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert certain references and extracts. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the two things most needed by the Government to win this war are men and money. The measures providing for the man power of the Nation have been enacted into law. Under these acts it is the purpose of the War Department to put an army of 5,000,000 men in France at an early date. The patriotic citizenship of the Republic will respond nobly to the call for more men to end the war quickly and victoriously.

This war, like all wars, is a merciless taskmaster and an extravagant spender when dealing with money needed to provide for its needs; but, sirs, when we contemplate the sacrifices being made by the soldiers of America on the battle fields of France, no good citizen will complain at the payment of taxes to sustain the Army in its most trying moments. The complaint about tax measures usually are not directed at the amount of tax levied, but at inequities that arise in the administration of the various provisions of the law. It is almost a superhuman task to raise the amount of revenue required to be met by this bill without inequities arising, and no doubt many such will be found when the bill has been enacted into law.

But we can all truthfully say that the Ways and Means Committee have given this measure their most careful consideration and have presented us a measure, upon the whole, far better than we had anticipated could be devised in the length of time granted them by the circumstances. They are to be congratulated upon presenting a measure that repeals and supplants all previous acts so that the people who are required to make the returns may the better understand what is required of them. The rate of taxation upon incomes, war profits, and excess profits is greatly increased.

This will meet the approval of the best citizens of the country, who at this time are not thinking of money making or the amassing of great fortunes, but are thinking of the welfare of their country and of their sons across the sea, who are fighting, bleeding, and dying for the preservation of the best form of government on earth.

I venture the assertion that there is not a man on the committee nor a Member of this House who, if it were possible in this bill, would drive out of business forever the war profiteers who have sprung into existence so recently, and at the same time would not intentionally do a particle of injustice to honest business.

Those who make large sums of money out of reasonable profits during the war are not profiteers and should not be injured or destroyed in an effort to rid the Nation of profiteering pirates. The war profiteers are those who are so devoid of conscience and love of country that they are willing to take advantage of the conditions brought about by the war and levy tribute upon the soldiers and citizens of the Nation by taking excessive profits for the things they must buy. They charge their own Government excessive prices for the things needed to win the war and gleefully boast of how they are making their fortunes while the times are good. God may forgive them, but the American people never.

The people of my State, like those of other States in the Union, have responded patriotically to every call made upon them for men and for money, but, Mr. Chairman, there exists a discrimination against the people of my State in reference to freight rates, not brought about by any provision of this bill nor by any act of the Director General of Railroads, which the provisions of this bill will add as an additional burden. Prior to the order of the Director General putting into effect the increase of 25 per cent on freight rates the railroads that traverse my State put into force a 28 per cent increase in rates, so that the increase of 25 per cent ordered by the Director General makes more than a 50 per cent increase above the rates in effect in Oklahoma prior to the 25th day of March, 1918.

From an investigation made of the effect of these rates the discrimination against the people of my State can be illustrated as follows:

Cattle can be shipped from Purcell, Okla., to Fort Worth, Tex., and shipped back as dressed meat, making a total distance of 342 miles, for 58 cents per 100 pounds, which is only 7½ cents more than the charge for shipping the cattle to Oklahoma City and the dressed meat back to Purcell, a distance of 67 miles. If the cattle be shipped from Wayne, Okla., instead of Purcell, a station 40 miles from Oklahoma City and 164 miles from Fort Worth, Tex., the rate would be 1½ cents per 100 pounds less if the slaughtering is done at Fort Worth, than if done at the packing plant at Oklahoma City. Pauls Valley, Okla., can obtain meats at Fort Worth, Tex., 150 miles away, at 7½ cents per 100 pounds cheaper than meat slaughtered at Oklahoma City, which is only 55 miles from Pauls Valley.

A farmer at Shawnee, Okla., slaughtering his cattle can ship the hides and market them at Kansas City, 380 miles away, at a rate of only 1½ cents above that to Oklahoma City, 36 miles distant. A farmer at Chandler, Okla., can ship to Kansas City, 333 miles, for one-half cent cheaper than he can to Oklahoma City, a distance of only 48 miles.

Crude oil shipped from Perry, Okla., to Kansas City, a distance of 302 miles, can be shipped for exactly the same freight rate that is charged for shipping the oil to Sapulpa, Okla., a distance of 96 miles.

The rate on ice for 50 miles in Oklahoma is increased 9 cents, or 80 per cent in all. Under the new rates ice can be shipped from Wellington, Kans., a distance of 48 miles, to Pond Creek, Okla., for only one-half cent per 100 pounds more than ice shipped from Enid, Okla., to Pond Creek, Okla., a distance of 20 miles.

Canned goods can be shipped from Davenport, Iowa, in carload lots to Kansas City, Mo., thence in less than carload lots to Adair, Okla., at a total rate of 73 cents per 100 pounds, while the same goods shipped to Muskogee, Okla., and distributed from Muskogee, in less than carload lots to the same place, must pay a rate of 76.5 cents, while Adair, Okla., is only 49 miles from Muskogee, Okla., and is 204 miles from Kansas City. The same canned goods can be shipped from the Iowa factory through Kansas City on the 73 cents total freight rate to Bushyhead, Okla., less than carload lots, a distance of 224 miles, while the same goods shipped 38 miles in less than carload lots from Tulsa, Okla., costs 74 cents per 100 pounds.

Corn shipped from Vinita, Okla., to Hollis, Okla., a distance of 362 miles, costs 2½ cents more per 100 pounds than if it goes 664 miles to Chicago.

Scrap iron from Bartlesville, Okla., to Muskogee, Okla., a distance of 101 miles, costs 3.6 cents more per 100 pounds than from Bartlesville, Okla., to Kansas City, a distance twice as great.

Fresh meats can be shipped from Wichita, Kans., through Oklahoma City, Okla., to Ardmore, Okla., on a rate of 67.5 cents, while fresh meats from Oklahoma City, Okla., to Ardmore, Okla., costs 66.5 cents. The distance from Wichita, Kans., to Ardmore is 271 miles, while the distance from Oklahoma City to Ardmore is 100 miles.

These are just a few examples showing the effect of the 28 per cent raise made by the railroad companies subsequent to March 25, 1918, and prior to the order of the Director General increasing all freight rates 25 per cent, upon the people of the State of Oklahoma. This condition has been brought to the attention of the rate-fixing department of the Director General's office, but up to the present time no general relief has been granted. We have confidence that these rates will be adjusted so as not to discriminate against our State, but our people are earnestly insisting that Oklahoma shall not be discriminated against and that early action is an urgent necessity in view of the present conditions in that State. After the railroads were taken over by the Government it was found to be necessary to increase all rates 25 per cent, and the people have not complained, although they have felt the heavy burden imposed. The people realize that it is imperative that we win the war, and they want it won quickly and not in piecemeal. In view of the increase in freight rates since the passage of the last tax measure, I am constrained to believe that the rate of taxation on freight transportation should be reduced from 3 to 2 per cent. This reduction, while infinitesimal when compared with the amount to be raised by the entire bill, will save a burden on the consumers of $38,351,511.54 annually and at the same time raise $2,788,182 more revenue than the 3 per cent rate without the 25 per cent increase in freight rates. In other words, the taxes in this bill on transportation should not overburden the people of the Nation, and in making the levy we should keep in mind the results of the increase in rates.

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment reducing the rate of taxation on freight transportation from 3 per cent, as provided in the bill, to 2 per cent.

The tax on passenger fares is high enough, and I am glad to know that no increase is provided in the bill and that the Director General has requested that the tax rate be made uniform so that universal mileage may be issued.

This will meet the commendation of the traveling public who, under the present congested conditions, travel under great hardships. The recent order of the Director General, requiring courteous treatment of the employees toward the public, met a hearty appreciation from the people generally.

In view of the attitude of employees toward the public after the Government took over the control of the roads the order was timely.

Years ago a great railroad magnate in an unguarded moment gave expression to the thought "the public be damned," and his employees proceeded to conduct themselves accordingly. A timid country woman, with a little tow-headed boy, went up to the ticket window and asked when the train would arrive, and received such a curt and insulting answer that marred all the anticipated pleasure of her journey. The little tow-headed boy resented deeply the treatment and never could outgrow the impression received. Thousands of little boys like him have grown to manhood, and they are to be found in the legislative halls, on the bench, on commissions and boards throughout the Nation.

They have tried to forget, but it has been hard. Thousands have served upon the juries of the land, and they found it hard to forget. The timid country woman in her calico dress and sunbonnet paid back in coin that was free and unlimited.

The sacrifices we make now will bring sweet memories in the future years when we contemplate the mighty struggle we passed through for the preservation of the Republic. The greater the sacrifice the more we shall enjoy the recollection of duty well done.

When the war is over great tasks will still confront us, and the trying ordeal through which we are passing will the better prepare us for future emergencies. America must take her place in the world's affairs whether willingly or not. America can never remain concerned only with internal domestic affairs. Her statesmen and her people must enlarge their vision and prepare to solve world-wide problems. Her great financiers and business men must prepare to meet the trade demands of the whole world. Our people are offering upon the altar of the Nation their wealth and their loved ones to suppress the military junkers of Prussia, who for all time can never wash from their foul hands the innocent blood of the millions sent to an untimely death by a proud, despicable Emperor who must eventually meet the fate that awaits the damned.

Mr. Chairman, America did not start this war, but the United States is going to end it. [Applause.] Yes; we are going to end it as quickly as possible, but not until the soil of Germany shall feel the pressure of the hob-nailed shoes of America's victorious soldiers and military autocracy is laid low in the dust of humility.

When the last charge is made and the last gun fired in this war may its departing echo be the last belligerent sound to fall upon human ears until time shall be no more. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, to win this war completely and speedily should be the sole purpose and the sole endeavor of every American citizen. To accomplish that end, one of the things we should do is to see that those in this country who labor and who are doing the Nation's work at home shall be treated fairly; shall be treated decently; shall, in fact, be given those working conditions that will conduce to efficiency and well-being.

I am led to discuss this afternoon, with that thought in view, a department of this Government that is served by the greatest number of employees and workers in any branch of the Government service, a department that intimately touches every citizen. In presenting these remarks I desire it to be distinctly understood that I am impelled by a sense of obligation to the country we serve and to the workers of that country whose welfare we should ever seek to protect.

At this time—at any time—criticism of a public official is justified only when the public welfare requires it. Especially is this true respecting one who has attained great heights of power. The condition to which our Postal Service has been brought—forced there, as it appears, by an unrelenting and oppressive system inaugurated by the present Postmaster General—has become a menace to the Nation's business, to the well-being of our people, and to the welfare of the several hundred thousand employees in his charge. Such a menace, grave in character and nation-wide in influence, demands immediate attention.

From almost the beginning of the Burleson administration we have known something was wrong in the Post Office Department. Recent evidence discloses that conditions there have become critical. The mail system that serves every business, every humble fireside, every brave soldier boy at the front has steadily declined in efficiency, and further demoralization is in prospect. Letters sent either fail to arrive or arrive after exasperating delay. It is an everyday, a common, occurrence for letters once posted never to be heard of again. The business of the country is dependent upon a speedy and certain mail service. The spirit and morale of our soldiers at war—at war in a distant part of the world—rest upon those words of love and cheer that come from the folks at home. Society itself is held together by the interchange of messages and thought through the means of communication now in the hands of the Postmaster General. These critical days require that mail service be even more speedy, more certain, than in quiet times of peace, when not so much is at stake. And yet on every hand I find business men complaining of the mail service; families have tried in vain to communicate with absent members; and many a soldier boy in the land "over there" has waited in vain for the messages sent by a loving mother, messages Mr. Burleson's system failed to deliver. Travelers returning from the war zone have ever stated that our soldier boys' single complaint is their failure to receive mail from home.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Do not do that!

Mr. BLANTON. I asked the gentleman to yield to a question. He is attacking a Cabinet officer of the land.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He ought to be attacked.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit he is attacking him unjustly. If the gentleman will yield to a civil question——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will not yield to a question, because I have not the time. If the gentleman wants to make a point of no quorum, that is his affair.

Mr. BLANTON. I think there should be more Members here to hear this attack upon a Cabinet officer.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if we were all here.

Mr. BLANTON. I think there is a good reason for the delay of the mail sent abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-eight Members are present.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the committee will vote that proposition down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, to save the time of the committee I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point can not be withdrawn now.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi and Mr. SHERLEY to act as tellers,

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of the motion to rise will pass through the tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 89.

The CHAIRMAN. Only 90 Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not interrupt a roll call.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask if this is a yea-and-nay vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to know what the vote is on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the calling of the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the revenue bill (H. R. 12863), found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 239 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] will proceed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire how much time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. These conditions came from causes, and the causes are not hard to find. Investigation discloses that the mail service is demoralized, a demoralization that results from a severe, even harsh, treatment of 300,000 postal employees under the system now in operation in the Post Office Department and from certain policies adopted that seem to ignore all consideration of efficiency.

We who knew Mr. Burleson before he became Postmaster General expected he would administer that office along the narrowest and most bitterly partisan lines. We were in no sense disappointed. He is the arch politician of the time. He can see no proposition except in a bitterly partisan way. If any of you are in doubt, ask anyone who served with him in Congress. When, therefore, Mr. Burleson stepped into his high office, we smiled as he promptly announced there was something wrong with the bookkeeping of his predecessor. It will be remembered Mr. Hitchcock during the last Republican administration had perfected the Postal Service so that it was not only supremely efficient but, for the first time in its history, self-supporting. This was too much for Mr. Burleson; he could not stand for any Republican to have that credit. So he jumped into the press, charging there was a deficit for the year 1911 of $732,301.90 instead of a surplus of $219,118.12, as claimed by Hitchcock. Of course, we all knew Hitchcock was right and Burleson was wrong. We smiled, because Burleson was coming up to expectations. There is no satisfaction that equals the one we feel when we see a man come up to expectations.

Our smile broadened considerably when his first annual report appeared. In that he claimed great credit for a surplus in the year ending June 30, 1913. Having pushed his predecessor off the roost of successfully handling the Post Office Department, he promptly perched himself thereon and began to crow wildly.

In that report he said that at last the department, under his wise management, had become self-supporting for the year referred to, and the subsequent year each showed a surplus. It never occurred to him that eight months of that first year were under Mr. Hitchcock, and the other four must of necessity have been but a continuance of his system, as Mr. Burleson had only taken office and was completely absorbed in firing Republican postmasters right and left, and putting in both deserving and undeserving Democrats.

Shortly after Mr. Burleson took office, a Member of this House, receiving many telegrams from postmasters in his district that they had been summarily ordered to resign, though their terms of office had not expired, called on the Postmaster General and protested. He was suavely informed that while theretofore the Post Office Department had been conducted on party lines, now a new era had dawned, and the department would be conducted on a purely business and nonpartisan basis. The Congressman grinned and replied: "Burleson, tell that to some one who does not know you; do not waste it on me."

The year ending June 30, 1915, found Mr. Burleson in a dilemma. Twist as he might, and juggle as he would, there stared in his face a deficit of $11,000,000. He could not rub it out; he could not wipe it out. So he dodged it. He serenely attributed it to the war in Europe. Just how the war in Europe in 1915 could affect the postal receipts and expenditures in America is not easy to see. If this war in Europe ends before Burleson's term expires, and the postal deficit continues, as it will, Burleson will be in a devil of a fix.

Let no one be deceived by the announced policy of the President that certain classes of postmasters are to be selected under the civil service. The President may have proposed, but Burleson has disposed. The Burleson system has the matter well in hand. In the first place, the policy was not made operative until all Republicans had been eliminated and Democrats appointed. Then Burleson's rules omitted all reappointments from the civil-service test. In other words, all Democratic postmasters could be sure of holding their jobs as long as they did not steal or die. But the Burleson system went much further. It required the Civil Service Commission to place a representative of Burleson on the examining board of three, who will, naturally, dominate the board and, in addition to that, the method of marking, the percentage to be given for this, that, and the other, all prescribed by Burleson, enable the Postmaster General to keep the appointments well in hand.

The Civil Service Commission has been made an agency of the Postmaster General, its freedom destroyed, and its capacity to act justly and fairly taken away. I wish to state, however, that it is my opinion that the First Assistant Postmaster General is doing his best to act fairly and impartially, but the system under which he works prevents that general result. The unholy fruit of this system is already beginning to appear. In a Massachusetts city the man who stood highest in the examination Mr. Burleson declined to appoint because the man had partisan proclivities—in other words, because he was a Republican. The next man on the list was a faithful Democrat, therefore devoid of partisanship, and so was appointed. The Wheeling Intelligencer says:

If there is any department of the public service that should be free from partisan spoil it is that which administers to the convenience of the business interests of the country and promotes the greater unity of the people through the distribution of the agencies of intelligence and the larger intercourse of the peoples of the different States by letter communication. All of these beneficent features he (Burleson) has utterly disrupted by the most brazen contempt of the ordinary legal restraints imposed on his department, and his utter disregard of the commonest political decencies. His has been the most shameful record, the greatest scandal on American Government. Strong words? All true, and the worst part of the record still unread.

Inquiry discloses that the greatest cause of inefficiency in the Postal Service is the Burleson system's treatment of its employees. The great characteristic of this system, and that which has demoralized the Postal Service, is the attitude of Burleson toward all men and women who work, toward the 300,000 employees whose fortunes and whose welfare are in the hollow of his hand. Almost at once the system attacked postal employees with undisguised vigor. Apparently to see workers well paid, contented, and in high spirits, doing their best, annoys greatly the head of this system. That sight he does not propose to see if he can help it. A little thing like an act of Congress does not bother Burleson very much.

His system is always restive under restraint. A few years ago Congress, after full consideration, increased the pay of rural mail carriers from $1,100 to $1,200 per year for standard routes. The Burleson system had ordered the rural carriers to refrain from all activity toward Members of Congress to secure the increase. This notwithstanding Congress had in 1912 passed a law specifically giving all postal employees this right. Imagine Burleson's rage when Congress granted this most deserved increase. But he was not to be beaten. By a cunning device, such as only a mind like his could produce, he found a way to defeat the will of Congress, and the rural carriers did not get the increase. They were thus robbed of about $3,000,000. The next year Congress, with some spirit, passed a resolution that compelled the Postmaster General to obey the law and grant this increase. In his next annual report Burleson gives this insult to Congress:

The difference between this amount and the audited surplus is due largely to payments made in 1917 to rural carriers in excess of compensation earned under the law for services performed in 1915. These payments, in the nature of a gratuity, were made pursuant to an act of Congress.

Gratuity, indeed! It was salary due them under an act of Congress and which Burleson had illegally withheld. Congress made the system disgorge, and it hurt. Remember, these rural carriers are men then earning, as all the evidence disclosed, scarcely $25 a month after paying for their horse feed and other expenses.

The Post Office bill recently passed by Congress grants an increase of pay to the rural carriers. The Burleson system vehemently protested against this increase; but the Republicans, joined by many Democrats, put it through. Likewise, the system arbitrarily reduced the salaries of collectors in the City Delivery Service from $1,200 to $1,000 a year, and continued this practice even after Congress ordered the proper salaries restored. Boys delivering special-delivery letters had been receiving 8 cents each, as provided by law, but the system could not endure seeing a boy earn the whole 8 cents the patron had placed on the letter for the purpose, so it put the boys on a miserly salary or substituted for them one of its favorite contract systems. Anyone who gets a special-delivery letter now in advance of the regular mail is in great luck. [Applause on the Republican side.] Substitutes for carriers who, in hope some day of steady employment, had been hanging between life and starvation, getting 30 cents an hour when they worked, were shoved a little nearer starvation by Burleson's system, which cut their scanty wages to 27½ cents per hour. City letter carriers and post-office clerks were arbitrarily robbed of their holidays until Congress came to their rescue. A cheap-labor contract system, without regard to efficiency, always looks good to Burleson's system. It has tried its best to have established such a system in place of the present rural carrier system. That system has been put into operation in the star-route service, and all the world knows how fearfully that has deteriorated.

Repressive measures of all kinds have been put into effect. Privileges enjoyed by the employees, making their work more agreeable and life more pleasant, have all been taken away, and now men are chained to their work, cowed, and browbeaten. Burleson's system has ruthlessly discharged aged Civil War veterans, ridiculing as sickening sentimentality any sympathy shown for such unfortunates.

When the National Guard was sent to the Mexican border in 1916 many members were in the Postal Service, and the system compelled them, although engaged in protecting their country on the border, to resign from the Postal Service, and thus deprived their families often of their only means of subsistence. In my own State was one distressing case of a postmaster of a third-class office. He went with the Guard to the border, and was compelled by Burleson to resign, leaving a wife and four small children practically without any means of support. On one occasion a letter carrier asked for leave to attend his father's funeral and was refused.

The Burleson system requires that its lieutenants throughout the country reflect the Burleson mind in their attitude to the employees under them. Thus it is almost a capital offense for a postmaster to be on good terms with the employees of the office. There is no way for a postmaster or field superintendent to secure smiling favor at the throne like earning a reputation for harsh and exacting treatment of employees. Under such a system is there any wonder that the service has deteriorated?

The Burleson system now demands that Congress repeal the act of 1912, giving postal employees the right to petition Congress and its Members. This is in keeping with its views toward people who work and in keeping with that which has been done in its department. Formerly the Postmaster General received the representatives of the employees, talked things over with them, and friendly relations existed. But no such situation with Burleson. When the representatives of the employees called to see him he refused to receive them, and the Burleson system throughout shut the doors against all representatives of employees.

Mr. Burleson can not endure any organization of his employees. For years there have been four large organizations of postal employees to advance their interests, to advance their welfare, and promote efficiency of service. They are the Association of Letter Carriers, Railway Mail Clerks, Post Office Clerks, and Rural Carriers. After five years of the Burleson system there is not much left of them. Whenever any of their officers were bold enough to speak up for their rights such officers have been promptly eliminated from the service. Thus the president of the Rural Carriers' Association, the president of the Railway Mail Clerks' Association, and the secretary of the Post Office Clerks' Association, whose only offense was to call the department's attention to certain injustices, were summarily discharged. The system's attitude toward these associations is displayed in the Postmaster General's recent annual report. After a two-page attack on these organizations he says:

> These organizations hold National and State conventions and some publish journals. The time of these conventions and the space in these journals are devoted almost entirely to matters of selfish interest.

How monstrous! What a crime! These men are even working to help themselves in the world. Selfish, indeed! Alas! that any employees of that department should ever have a selfish thought when they are under the Great Albert, whose whole life has been such a model of self-denial and unselfish devotion to the welfare and interests of his fellow man, with never a thought for himself.

Burleson's system is going to see to it that these men do not waste any time going to conventions and looking out for their own interests. The worm is not to wiggle unless the tyrant speaks. It has fixed them all right. It issued a mighty order forbidding all leaves of absence except for sickness. That put a stop to their organizations and selfish work. Thereafter they would keep their noses to the grindstone and cease to think, as well-regulated workers ought to behave. Mr. E. J. Gainor, of Muncie, Ind., was the president of the Letter Carriers' Association. As such he had placed in his care property belonging to the association valued at nearly a million dollars. He asked for a temporary leave of absence to attend to some business connected with this trust. His request was emphatically refused. Later there gathered at Buffalo the American Federation of Labor convention, a great convention of representatives of organized labor. That convention was opened by the President of the United States with a notable speech. Mr. Gainor was a delegate to that convention, representing his 25,000 letter carriers. He applied for permission to attend, and was told the only way he could go was to resign from the Postal Service. He resigned and went. I honor his courage and sacrifice. But what a spectacle!

The President goes, and properly, to open this convention of which he was not a member, while Burleson's system would not let this delegate, representing a great body of workers, attend unless he gave up the position in which he had an unblemished record of 20 years! Surely the humble toiler is a pretty small worm in the system's sight!

Some of these postal associations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and that crime the system can never forgive. For some reason—we do not even speculate on what it is—Burleson seems strongly to dislike labor unions. In his last annual report Mr. Burleson severely condemns organized labor for attempting to organize the employees of his department, and he distinctly lays down the law against the affiliation of postal employees with other labor organizations. This attitude of the Postmaster General is important, not only because of the 300,000 postal employees under him but especially because he aims to be the political dictator of this administration, directing the administration's policies in this regard, and thus likely to affect millions of workers in the land.

The American Federation of Labor, in its meeting at Buffalo, N. Y., November 12, 1917, concurred in the following resolution presented by certain delegates:

> Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, emphatically condemns the autocratic policy of Postmaster General Burleson toward the postal employees, and hereby instructs the executive council to cooperate with representatives of the affiliated postal employees' organizations in securing an audience with President Wilson and placing before him all the facts concerning the oppressive labor policy of Postmaster General Burleson.

The query naturally comes, Is this unfriendly attitude toward labor a recent development on the part of Mr. Burleson and his system? And inquiry into the past discloses that it is not. Rather it is a manifestation of an attitude toward labor which the Postmaster General may have inherited from his surroundings, but which he certainly always has had.

Mr. Burleson inherited a large quantity of land in Texas—several thousand acres—and in partnership with his brother-in-law, C. D. Johns, operated these broad acres, using convict labor. These laborers were hired from the State and were worked on the Burleson and Johns farm. Mr. Burleson is not to be charged with the institution of the convict-labor system or its abuses in Texas. The institution was there, and had been for some time, in all its revolting character. Mr. Burleson's sole responsibility comes from his having utilized the system for his own profit. This feature is discussed here solely to show that, by training, surroundings, and practice, Mr. Burleson's attitude toward labor is one that has brought hardship to our postal employees and decreased the efficiency of the service. There were several convict farms of this character in Texas besides the Burleson farm, and conditions on all these became so unspeakable that a committee of the Texas Legislature, consisting of four senators and five representatives, conducted an investigation. Conditions were found so monstrous on these farms that all of Texas was horrified, and the legislature speedily passed a law forever prohibiting the practice.

The contract between Burleson and his brother-in-law with the State penitentiary officials provided that while the convicts were at work they should be under the management and control of the prison guards, that 60 per cent of the profits should go to the State and 40 per cent to Burleson and Johns, while section 2 provides that the convicts worked shall be white and Mexican, and they are "to consist of that class of convicts who because of youth, old age, or some physical infirmity are not suited for contract farms or railroad work."

Thus it will be seen that the poor wretches who were to toil and suffer were young lads whose feet had strayed for the first time and the old men whose faltering steps would soon lead them to the grave. To these were added those suffering from sickness or bodily infirmity—the very cheapest kind of labor. That to which these tender youths, feeble old men, and physically infirm were subjected is well-nigh incredible. But the evidence is so clear, complete, and undenied that, revolting as it all is, it must be believed.

The committee of investigation to which I have referred reported the testimony they took, their conclusions and recommendations, in a book that was published by the Texas Legislature, entitled "Report of the Penitentiary Investigation Committee."

In their report this committee said on page 12:

> On practically all farms the men are taken from the buildings as early in the morning as the guards can see to guard them and prevent their escape, and are returned to the buildings for the day between sundown and dark.

And on the same page:

> Testimony was adduced to the fact that excessive work and general bad treatment make a wreck of many strong men in a few years, and when they leave the penitentiary they are in many instances unfit for manual labor. * * * In many instances in the past the men have been run to and from their work, the distance sometimes being from 1 to 3 miles, and while at work they have often been pushed excessively.

Again, on page 13:

> Ritchie also testified that a sergeant there on the Burleson and Johns farm, but now occupying a higher position in the penitentiary system, had an interest with the owners of said farm in a drove of hogs which were being fed on the premises. We direct special attention to this testimony, since the twenty-eighth legislature passed an act expressly forbidding any sergeant, guard, or other officer or employee from accepting or receiving any salary or compensation from any person or corporation hiring convicts, and fixing a penalty therefor.

The evidence disclosed that these convicts were often whipped, using a short handle of wood, to which were fastened several straps 5 feet long, each above an inch wide. Under this cruel lash the naked flesh was cut and torn, and in many instances the poor sufferer died. Commenting on this, two members of the investigating committee speak as follows, page 20:

Those intrusted with the care of human beings, even be they convicts, have proven by their action in whipping many of these helpless creatures illegally, inhumanely, and some of them to death for trivial offenses, that they have forfeited their trust, and hence the only remedy is to absolutely forbid them to exercise their brutal inclinations by abolishing the use of this corporal and soul-killing instrument. If a mother, at the birth of her babe, knowing the hellish conditions prevailing on some of the Texas penitentiary farms, camps, and coal mines, could foresee that her darling would in course of time be condemned to one of these places, she would perform a charitable act to emulate the mocking bird, when it, failing to liberate its ensnared young one, brings it a poisonous berry, utters a chirping cry, vanishes into space—and mourns.

In October, 1909, this investigating committee visited the Burleson and Johns farm, and there the following testimony was taken, as applied to that farm. (See p. 578.)

Capt. Brooks, of the Burleson and Johns farm, looking at his record book, testified:

This shows B. F. Luce punished, 18 licks; offense, laziness. The other man's name is Joe Oliver; punished on the 4th for laziness and given 17 licks. This book is my time book. Yes, sir; both of these men were punished for laziness.

Picture, if you can, these tender youths in their teens, these tottering old men, these sick and infirm, with bared backs, receiving the lash for laziness! Little wonder many sank and died.

J. C. Zachery, on page 581, testified as follows:

I was in the plowing gang. I don't know how they got across the river. I had to cross it myself. I waded it. Yes, sir; in cold weather and all kinds, every night and morning. I generally pulled my shoes, pants, and drawers off to cross. The water was not the same depth all the time. It would generally come from the knees up to the waist on me.

The convict, P. Hubbard, on page 584, testified as follows:

I would be afraid to tell of any complaint I had to make. My reason is that I have been in here a long time and have never seen a convict tell anything to anyone that came in to visit them or anyone going out that they didn't get punished for it if they ever found it out. There is a whole lot that has been done here, and I know you gentlemen will do what you say, but I am uneasy about telling it. I am here for a long time yet, and my punishment would be so severe I couldn't stand it. If I was only here for a short while, I would tell you and take my punishment. I am 25 years old. I have been in over 6 years.

On page 993, J. B. Maurice testified as follows:

The inspector went into the building. He said to the men, "I have turned you all over to Capt. Brooks, and if 20 licks don't do I'll give orders for 120; and if that don't do, by the eternal gods I will give 1,020; as long as you got a—I'll furnish the leather."

On page 585, J. S. Lowry testified as follows:

Yes, sir; he knew of the guards whipping Foster. I said I didn't count the licks. They whipped him four or five times a day. They beat him up until they saw he was going to die, and kept him there two or three weeks and sent him to Huntsville. I saw the guards make Foster get up into a tree. The tree was full of ants and they got all over him. They kept him there 30 or 40 minutes. The ants got on this man Foster when they put him in the tree. The old stump was infested with ants, and they came out and got on him. The stump was 2 or 3 feet high.

Behold that picture if you can! This man, with naked body, torn by the lash and bleeding from a score of wounds, compelled to stand on an old stump, while ants swarmed over him, crawled into his wounds, and stung his quivering flesh into a frenzy of pain!

Continuing, this witness said:

There was two or three other men murdered in cold blood down there on the farm. The first man's name I do not remember, but they called him "Hot Bread." That was in May, 1907. He was murdered because he couldn't keep up with the squad, and the guard tied a rope around his neck and tied it to the horn of his saddle. He lived about three days after that. Jim Kittlebrand, the dog sergeant, did that. He was buried on the hill near the prison. I don't know where Kittlebrand is now. I know he is on the black list. The next man was by the name of Dunn. He was beaten to death by Bob Whitley and Boss Kittlebrand. He lived until about 9 o'clock that night. They didn't have the doctor with him. They buried him up on the hill, too. The sergeant was there on the camp. Gentry was the sergeant at the time. There was another fellow, a Mexican, that died this same night. I don't remember his name or his nickname or anything by which you could identify him. He was whipped with Mick Dunn in the field, and the guard whipped them until they gave out and then tied them down in the field with their face up to the sun.

I have felt the burning tropical sun when it parched and blistered and seemed more than the human frame could endure; but that was as nothing compared to the suffering of these two miserable creatures, whipped until they fell, with naked bodies bleeding and torn, tied down with their faces up to the burning southern sun! Mr. Chairman, hell can have no terrors for convicts that toiled and suffered on one of these convict farms.

A man named Durham was accused by the grand jury of murder of one of the convicts on this farm. He was tried for this alleged murder and acquitted because, as it was stated, there was not evidence corroborative of the convicts, and under the Texas law a convict's testimony was not sufficient to convict a man of a crime. In 1913 Mr. Burleson became Postmaster General, and during that year he appointed this man Durham a postmaster at Longview, in Texas.

A former governor of Texas recently had the following to say:

In the spring of 1916 I was informed by Burleson's associate in business that the famous Burleson-Johns plantation of several thousand acres, formerly worked by leased convicts from the State to Burleson and Johns, could be leased to the State. I looked at the place and there was nothing doing. When I looked at the place there came back to my mind the vivid and regretful recollection of that system of slavery which Texas all too long permitted—of leasing the unfortunate convicts to the taskmasters, who laid the unmerciful lash upon the bare backs of unoffending prisoners in order that more work be done in a day. Tainted money—yea, there will never be a more martyred human sacrifice in the history of man than that endured and suffered by the Texas convicts, whose liberty in the past has been sold to those whose greed would weigh so many ounces of Government gold against so many drops of human blood.

Such was the system in Texas under which Mr. Burleson acted, and from it his views on labor must have been largely influenced. It could not be otherwise. Mr. Burleson doubtless would never have put into effect any such hideous barbarities, but he must have known of their existence, and he used the system. From such surroundings and experience we do not think any man can come with sound views respecting the toilers of the world. There have now been placed in the Postmaster General's hands the fortunes of 400,000 workers of the telephone and telegraph systems of the country. What is to be their fate? I for one am convinced that the welfare of the country requires a change in the system's policy toward the postal employees and all other employees intrusted to it. Congress must safeguard the interests of these faithful and deserving employees. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not feel called upon to enter any defense for the Postmaster General against the calumnies and slanders that have been uttered on the floor of this House. He needs none. I came into the Hall just as the gentleman from Minnesota was beginning the second part of his speech in denunciation of the Postmaster General. I did not hear what he had said before. His speech was a prepared one and was read by him from the stand. He seemed to have concluded long ago that it was necessary for him, in order that he might obtain some distinction or importance upon this floor, to villify and calumniate his personal, political, and moral superiors. [Applause.] I do not know about all that the gentleman has said. That part about which I do know which he discussed, every word that he uttered in reference to it was absolutely untrue. The gentleman feels called upon every day to rush down this aisle and take his stand here and instruct this House about something that he thinks the House does not know. It has reached the point in the House when every man upon this side, at least, when the gentleman from Minnesota speaks, realizes that he has come full of venom, hatred, and vituperation to utter against people who do not happen to agree with him, politically or otherwise. As far as I am concerned, I have formed a profound contempt for his conduct long since. Now he charges Burleson with falsely saying that the administration that preceded him had not produced a surplus. Every man who is not a fool or a liar knows that it did not produce a surplus; that the only surplus indicated was, as shown upon the proof, a surplus produced by the acceptance of credits by the department for the last quarter of that fiscal year and a failure to charge bills payable. That was in the Hitchcock administration. Burleson has so managed the affairs of the Post Office Department as to produce, since he has been in office, not only a more efficient and a better service than the Government ever had before, but it has extended the service. [Applause on the Democratic side and laughter on the Republican side.] Yes; you on that side hate the truth, but listen to the facts. Did he not give the mail to 20,000,000 more people than had ever had it before?

Certainly the man that laughs at that is foolish. [Laughter.] Not only that, but he has produced a surplus in this period of more than $12,000,000—never before done, except under a Democratic administration many years before.

Of course, he has been economical. Of course, he has been, in a measure, exacting to enforce on the part of the employees of the Government obedience to orders and in the performance of a public duty. Gen. Burleson is not popular with those gentlemen on the Republican side who feel that under the civil-service rules every Republican that was in the Post Office Department when the Democratic administration came in should continue and everybody else appointed ought to be Republican. You have forgotten that power was wrenched from you on account of your crimes, and you have no right to demand it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My only charge against Gen. Burleson is that he has been too liberal in giving offices to Republicans. You are not entitled to them, and you ought not to have them, and you are not going to get them, I hope, under the Post Office Department, even though you do get from every other source under the Government more than you could rightfully demand.

Gentlemen, it is very common for a gentleman to get up here and abuse public officials. I do not know anything about these charges made by the gentleman from Minnesota about conditions in Texas on convict-labor farms. I assume, however, that Mr. Burleson is not responsible for the convict system of Texas, whether it be a good system or a bad one. But I could not help thinking as the gentleman proceeded, making statement after statement in reference to the private life and public career of Gen. Burleson, that he felt some way the superiority of Gen. Burleson over him both as a private citizen and as a public man and felt that the only way to attract attention in this House against Gen. Burleson was to make the assault that he did make. It is the inevitable result of low breeding and a low order of mind exemplified by the commonest of plebians. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the gentleman speaks of Mr. Burleson refusing to grant leave of absence. I defy him to show in the whole Post Office Department where a person who was entitled under the law, either to the sick leave or to the general leave, who has not gotten it. He tells us about the gag law, that the employees of the department were not permitted to consult their Congressmen and Senators under the gag law, and that Burleson wanted to reenact it. Let me remind the gentleman that the gag law was inugurated by the Republican Party for the Post Office Department and exercised and enforced with the utmost vigor, and it was only when the Democrats got control that the infernal law or rule was repealed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. What is the question?

Mr. GOOD. My recollection is that that law—I looked it up some time ago—that order was first promulgated by President Cleveland and subsequently reissued by President Roosevelt and afterwards by President Taft.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; that rule was never promulgated except by a partisan Republican, with Hitchcock at the head of the department. It never has been a law, but a rule and regulation with the department and under a Republican administration; it was in violation of law, order, and decency, and the gentleman from Minnesota, with the complacency of a political coward, talks about the Democratic Party attempting to restore it.

Mr. Chairman, it is inconceivable to my mind that any sensible man would feel called upon to sit down and hunt out all the false charges, and all the true ones, if it were necessary to repeat them, and run them together in one great long string, in a carefully prepared speech, in order to reflect upon the character and standing of an official of the Government, a member of the Cabinet of the United States. Does he think he does his country any good? Does he think it does the party any good by the introduction of a long chain of lies of that character? I think not. It is in these times and under these conditions almost next to treason for any man in this body, or elsewhere, to attempt to bring into ridicule and contempt a high official of the Federal Government, but of course I was not surprised at an effort of that sort on the part of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Now, as I remarked in the beginning, I am not here to take up all of the charges against Gen. Burleson; he is able to defend himself and he can defend himself. These are not charges affecting the public service; they are personal slanders, and I vouch that if the gentleman from Minnesota will go to Gen. Burleson and repeat these charges, instead of standing here like a coward under the protection of this House, and slander the Postmaster General, that the Postmaster General will give him that which a man of his character deserves for that sort of a speech. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I would if I had the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a half minute remaining.

Mr. FOCHT. I think the country is more interested in knowing why the boys in France do not get their mail and why the whole post-office system in the United States is broken down, rather than knowing anything about the penitentiary in Texas. Why do they not get their mail, and why do not the folks at home hear from them?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I take it the gentleman has asked that question in good faith.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; I want to know what the country is deeply interested in knowing.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I take it the gentleman has asked that question in good faith——

Mr. FOCHT. I have.

Mr. MOON. And that it is not a part of the alignment of the contemptuous charges which the venomous gentleman from Minnesota presented. Therefore, I shall try to answer him. The Post Office Department has charge of the mail, as I am informed, until it is delivered in France.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. MOON. When the mail reaches France it is then turned over to the representatives of the War Department to find the soldier, wherever he may be. No one knows the exact address of the soldier at the time. The postal officials there could not obtain it at the time. It has to go through the military channels after it leaves the postal channels, and wherever the soldier may be—on the march or in the field or camp—he must first be found and the mail is then delivered. That is my information. I have never been there and I do not know personally about it. The gentleman can see very readily that having to pursue that course it is impossible to have a prompt delivery of mail. Unquestionably mail is delayed sometimes beyond the period which it ought to be delayed. That probably results from want of information on the part of those at the place distributed in respect to the location of the soldier to whom the mail is addressed. The gentleman certainly knows that the Post Office Department is exercising all of the care and discretion it can, and as much as anybody could, under the circumstances, to give the best delivery of mail to the soldier.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman not feel that if they would treat the men a little better—the men on the postal cars, the men who go out over the mountains and the rivers—if they were treated a little better—those who go out in the storm and in the heat—by Mr. Burleson——

Mr. MOON. The gentleman means here at home?

Mr. FOCHT. In this country; yes.

Mr. MOON. Oh, I can tell you about that.

Mr. FOCHT. I can give the gentleman thousands of instances of inefficiency and demoralization on account of poor pay and bad working conditions.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Burleson treats them according to the law, and he is not authorized to treat them otherwise. They are the best salaried men in the Government.

Mr. FOCHT. They are the hardest worked and the poorest paid in the Government.

Mr. MOON. I have heard before charges of that sort by men who tried to curry favor with the employees at the expense of the Postal Department.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to have five minutes to speak on this question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I undertake to address the membership of this House. I believe too much time is taken up in that practice, but under the circumstances arising here to-day, by reason of the fact that a certain Member has seen fit to descend from the exalted station which a Representative should occupy down to the level of a character assassin I deem it imperative to say something. I come from Texas and I represent the district that the honorable Postmaster General resides in. I am familiar with the convict laws and the convict system of Texas. I doubt whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is familiar with the convict laws of Minnesota. He quoted from the contract that was made by the State of Texas with Burleson and Johns. Having quoted from that contract, he must know its contents. If, knowing its contents, he has attempted to mislead this House he is dishonest. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If he read that contract he knows this. He knows that the State of Texas through a convict board leased from Burleson and Johns a convict farm; that Burleson and Johns did not have one iota to do with the discipline and control of the convicts on that farm. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He read that contract. He knows that the State employed the guards; that the State employed the sergeant; that the State instructed and authorized the whipping—what whipping they had; and he knows that Burleson and Johns could not say one word about whether the convicts should be whipped or not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I shall put into the RECORD the entire contract, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let it go in.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And the gentleman will find that Burleson and Johns owned the farm.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Sure.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And hired the convicts under the system I have mentioned.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Sure they owned the land, and the State of Texas leased it from them for a portion of the crop.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is wrong. The State of Texas had nothing to do with the land.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We will see who is wrong.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I shall put it in the RECORD. I have it here.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We will see who is wrong. This, Mr. Chairman, is not a new subject. Its sole object is for the purpose of bolstering up the political fortunes of a man, and I want to make the statement that the man who attempts to tear down the character of another to benefit himself is an undesirable citizen. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is not a new subject. Let me read you a letter that was written to a United States Senator by the Postmaster General himself in reply to same charges during the campaign:

ALLENHURST, N. J., September 8, 1916.

Hon. ——— ———,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have just read of the attack on me made by you in the Senate on September 7. To me it is inconceivable that a man who has been elected to the United States Senate would willingly lend himself as a tool for the dissemination of baseless slanders, hence I am forced to believe that some contemptible creature has shamefully deceived you.

For years the State of Texas, in an effort to solve the vexatious convict problem in the most humane way, has employed the unfortunates who have been convicted in her courts of felonies in the cultivation of corn, cotton, and cane on plantations owned by the State.

When the policy was first adopted Texas did not own cultivated land sufficient for this purpose. I was part owner of an isolated plantation which the State authorities deemed desirable to use in carrying out this policy. The owners of this plantation leased it to the State and for years it was so used. The plantation was leased, just as other landlords leased their lands to tenants, for a fractional part of the corn and cotton grown thereon, with this difference, namely: In ordinary cases the landlord has some voice about the work done in cultivating his land, whereas in the lease of the plantation above referred to the State authorities reserved the exclusive right to manage, control, and discipline the labor used in its cultivation. Thus, you see, by no process of reasoning can you reach the conclusion that I either hired convict labor or was responsible for its management. Neither have I ever been charged with unfriendliness to labor nor a wanton slanderer of their leaders.

Maj. Thomas E. Durham, the superintendent of the plantation referred to, was employed by the State. He was an honest, efficient, capable servant of his State. He was indicted, as you charge, but it was believed by those in a position to know, that this indictment was secured in order to embarrass the then governor of Texas, who was distantly related to Maj. Durham. The testimony relied on for his conviction was that of convicts, and in order for them to qualify as witnesses the governor was called on to pardon them. This he refused to do. Afterwards, while another was governor, the case was disposed of, and Maj. Durham was speedily acquitted. He was an applicant for a small post-office appointment, and, with the acquiescence of his Representative in Congress, I recommended his appointment. He made a popular and efficient officer. He is now dead and can not speak for himself, but either Senator from Texas can tell you that he was a good citizen.

These are the facts.

Desperate indeed must be the political situation when men are driven to the adoption of such foul methods of fighting. Eight times I was unanimously nominated for Congress in the district where I was born and reared. Eight times I was elected—five times without opposition from any party. Never during all these years were the Republicans of my district willing to sacrifice honesty and truth to the extent of even attempting to make the leasing to the State of the plantation referred to a political issue.

I take it that you will be willing, when the facts are made known to you, to correct the vilely false impressions left on the minds of those who heard or may read the statement you made.

Be honest and tell the truth. These are safe rules of human conduct. Their observance is necessary for those who enjoy the confidence of worthy men.

Respectfully, A. S. BURLESON.

Now, it is true, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] said, that Maj. Durham, who was indicted for having whipped a convict who died from other causes, was acquitted because convicts could not testify against him; but another governor from Texas was elected, the case was continued, and the convicts were pardoned, and they testified and Maj. Durham promptly came clear. Why did not the gentleman state those facts when speaking to the question if he wanted to be honest about it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, gentlemen, I want to know if the gentleman has investigated the laws of Minnesota. They used to hire convicts out and gave control of them to private concerns, that their blood might be coined into dollars. The Legislature of Minnesota, like the Legislature of Texas, passed a law stopping that, and yet upon the laws of the State of Minnesota there is to-day a statute which says:

If any such convict shall attempt to injure the buildings or appurtenances, or to resist the lawful authority of any officer or guard, or shall refuse to obey their reasonable demand, such officer or guard may enforce obedience and discipline in such manner as may appear necessary; and if, in so doing, any convict so resisting lawful authority shall be necessarily wounded or killed by such officer, guard, or assistant, they shall be held justified.

Go sweep your own house before trying to interfere with a sister State. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I regret that the gentleman has seen proper to indulge in villification and abuse of an honest man. Mr. Burleson may have some faults; every man has faults. Mankind and all his works are imperfect, but during his more than 25 years of public service no man can truthfully assail his honesty, his integrity, and his fearless discharge of his every duty. Let me tell you the character assassin, the tongue of the slanderer, is the greatest evil that afflicts humanity. I heard this amply illustrated once when I heard there existed a good priest, a member of the Catholic Church, and many sinners went to him to be given pardon and absolution for their sins. One came in and admitted that he had stolen, and he forgave him by telling him to restore to the man from whom he had stolen the amount he had stolen. Another confessed he had committed burglary, another to burning a house, and he required of them, if possible, to make all restitution. Finally a man came in—I imagine he looked like the man from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]; I imagine he had the same countenance, and the same expression, and the same temperament, and the same intent and design. He said, "Holy Father, I have slandered by fellow man and I have slandered a woman." The holy father said, "There is a duck out in the yard. Take that duck and kill it. Go down this road; walk slowly and pick it as you go. Come back by the time you have picked off every feather and all down from that duck." The penitent went and did as he was told. He came back, and said, "Father, I have complied with your request." The father said, "Now travel the same road you traveled, gather together every feather, gather together every particle of down, put them in this sack, and bring them back to me." The penitent hung his head, scratched it, and said, "Father, that is impossible. The high wind has blown the feathers and the down to the uttermost corners of the earth." The father said, "Just so it is impossible for you to render restitution for the crime of slander you have committed. Every sin under the Catholic faith is forgivable, but it is the one sin that is beyond the scope of restitution. It is God's worst enemy and the devil's best friend." Gentleman, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I have just a moment to ask the gentleman from Texas if he desires a copy of this contract to be placed in the RECORD?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am perfectly willing to have it placed in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print the contract which I am informed is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman ought to have a chance to look it over; I am informed it is correct, although I have not compared it myself.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will look it over.

The contract referred to is as follows:

STATE OF TEXAS,
County of Walker:

This agreement made and entered into by and between Benton McMillin, of Walker County, Tex., and J. A. Herring, of Walter County, State of Texas, acting for themselves and their successors in office in their official capacities as financial agent and superintendent of the Texas State penitentiaries, parties of the first part, and hereinafter designated as the State, and A. S. Burleson, of Travis, and C. D. Johns, also of Travis County, acting for themselves, parties of the second part, witnesseth:

1. That this is an agreement between the said parties to work on the share system, with convict labor, the farm or farms in Hill and Bosque Counties, known as the Steiner Valley Farm, for the term of two (2) years commencing January 1, 1908, and ending December 31, 1909, and subject to the conditions hereinafter named in this contract.

2. For the purpose of operating said farm on said share system the State agrees to perform and furnish as follows:

(1) The labor and services of 125 or more (as can be furnished by the State) convicts belonging to the Texas State penitentiaries, who are to be whites and Mexicans, and who can under the penitentiary rules be so contracted to work outside the penitentiary walls, the same to consist of that class of convicts, who because of youth, old age, or some physical infirmity are not suited for contract farms or railroad work, but who are nevertheless capacitated to perform labor on a share farm.

(2) To appoint and pay a sergeant and a sufficient number of guards to keep securely said convicts and to maintain amongst them proper industry and good discipline; also to feed and board said sergeant and guards.

(3) To clothe and feed said convicts in accordance with the rules and regulations of the penitentiaries; to furnish them with bedding, with tobacco, with medicines, and medicial attention.

(4) To furnish cooking stoves, lamps, oil, and table furniture for sergeants, guards, and convicts, and, in short, to furnish everything necessary and incidental to the management and keeping of said convicts not especially contracted to be performed by said parties of the second part.

The parties of the second part agree to perform and furnish as follows:

(1) To furnish about 2,000 acres of good fertile land on the farm of said Burleson and Johns in Hill and Bosque Counties, already cleared, fenced, and in good state of cultivation, and sufficiently near the prison house to be conveniently worked therefrom, the land so furnished to be planted and cultivated about ——— acres in corn, about 2,000 acres in cotton, and balance in such other products as may be agreed upon.

(2) To furnish sufficient teams of good strong mules with which to cultivate the land, not less than one mule to every 25 acres of land, and to provide and keep on hand a sufficiency of forage with which to keep said mules in good condition while engaged in the cultivation of said land.

(3) To furnish and have kept in good repair a sufficient number of wagons, plows, gears, hoes, and other farming implements, all of the best kind, necessary in the preparation of said land and in the cultivation, harvesting, and marketing of the crops grown thereon.

(4) To furnish the necessary ginhouse, gins, cotton press, gristmill, and steam power to run the same; also such skilled labor as may be necessary in operating said machinery, but it is understood that one-half the wages of one engineer is to be paid by the State.

(5) In case it becomes necessary to work the convicts so far away from the building that it is inconvenient to return to their meals or to secure shelter during rain or bad weather, it shall be the duty of the contractors to provide the necessary shelter for their protection.

(6) To grind into meal for the guards and convicts such corn as may be furnished by the State for that purpose.

(7) To furnish such horses and saddles, and feed such horses free of expense to the State, as may be required by the sergeants and guards in the discharge of their duties.

(8) To furnish transportation for convicts and supplies to and from the railroad depot at Fowler, Tex.

(9) To provide good comfortable quarters for the sergeant and guards convenient to the prison house; also a good prison house, hospital, dining room, and kitchen for the convicts, as is prescribed by the rules; the plan and location for all such buildings to be approved by the superintendent of the penitentiaries. All windows and doors in said buildings and in quarters furnished for sergeant and guards to be covered with wire screens to protect occupants against flies and mosquitos.

(10) To furnish wood necessary for fuel for the camp.

(11) To furnish necessary heating stoves for prison building, dining room, and guards' quarters and to keep same in good repair.

(12) To furnish lime for sanitary and building purposes and to have buildings whitewashed outside at least twice a year, and inside once per month.

(13) To furnish sufficient land necessary for garden and truck patches on which to raise vegetables for convicts and guards, the seed to plant the same to be furnished by the State, but it is hereby understood that the seed for planting the crop on said farm is to be furnished by the parties of the second part.

(14) To furnish the wagons and teams for hauling the State's share of the crop to the nearest railroad shipping station.

(15) To furnish storage for the State's supplies for the convict camp and for the State's share of the crop undisposed of.

(16) It is hereby understood that the bagging, ties, and twines for baling the cotton shall be furnished proportionately by both parties.

4. The crop of cotton, cotton seed, and all products of whatever description, raised on said land by said convict labor (except in the garden and truck patches, where the seed is furnished by the State), when gathered and ready for the market, shall be divided between the State and the parties of the second part, viz., the State shall receive 60 per cent and the party of the second part 40 per cent; such division to be made either of the products themselves or of the net proceeds after sale, as may be agreed upon by the financial agent of the penitentiaries and the said parties of the second part.

5. It is further agreed that on the 10th of each month the parties of the second part shall pay to the financial agent of the penitentiaries all running expenses that have been advanced during the preceding month by the said financial agent for the purpose of maintaining, working, and guarding said convict force, these amounts to be repaid to the parties of the second part, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum after said crop is marketed.

6. It is agreed that the convict labor herein contracted shall be used in the preparation of said land, and the planting, cultivating, and harvesting of the crop worked on shares; for keeping fences, ditches, prison quarters, and farm buildings in proper repair; for feeding and taking care of farm teams and guards' horses; for driving farm teams, for ginning the crop and hauling the same to the depot; and in short, for doing all such work as is incidental to the making, the gathering and the marketing of said crops, and it is further agreed that if the parties of the second part desire to use said force, or any part thereof, for making permanent improvements, or for doing any other work on this farm or elsewhere, not above mentioned, the consent of the superintendent of the penitentiaries must first be had and shall pay 70 cents per day for each man to the financial agent, provided the crop shall not be neglected for any extra work.

7. It is agreed that if a larger crop is made on the place than can be gathered by the average force of convicts who cultivated it, and it becomes necessary to employ free labor to gather said crop, then the expense of such labor shall be equally borne by the parties hereto, but no expense shall be incurred unless approved by the financial agent.

8. At the termination of this contract by limitation or otherwise the said convicts and camp property belonging to the State are to be returned to the nearest penitentiary or to such other place as may be designated by the superintendent of penitentiaries, not further than the nearest penitentiary by rail, at the expense of the party of the second part.

9. The party of the second part shall by himself, or by his agent, have the right to direct the labor of the convicts in the cultivation and gathering of the crop, but all orders shall be given through the sergeant, and said convicts shall be worked in accordance with the rules of the penitentiaries.

10. The penitentiary officials shall have entire control of the discipline and treatment of the convicts, and it is their duty, and especially the duty of the sergeant and guards in charge, to require that each and every convict herein contracted, when physically able, in proper hours and suitable weather, shall do and perform good and sufficient work, and in such manner as shall be required by the party of the second part or his agent.

11. The superintendent of penitentiaries shall have the right to remove any convict of said force, but shall, if necessary, supply his place with another convict as soon as practicable, if the force is under the number contracted.

12. The said party of the second part hereby agrees to give to the party of the first part, within 10 days after the execution of this contract, his bond in the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars, with two or more good and sufficient sureties conditioned upon the faithful performance of same.

13. It is further agreed that the parties of the second part shall furnish the necessary corn for meal to supply the force and the parties of the first part agree to pay for same at the rate of 18 cents per bushel.

14. It is further agreed that the parties of the second part shall pay to the parties of the first part the sum of twenty-five ($25) dollars per month for the slops.

15. It is further agreed that the parties of the second part shall put in at once and keep in good repair a long-distance telephone connection with their prison building and Fowler.

16. It is further agreed that the superintendent of penitentiaries has the authority to cut out all acreage which, in his judgment, can not be profitably cultivated, and to select what land is to be planted in cotton.

17. The party of the second part shall purchase such number of cultivators and other modern labor-saving implements and machines as in the judgment of the superintendent of penitentiaries are necessary for the proper and economical cultivation of said farms.

18. It is distinctly agreed and understood that this contract is made subject to all provisions of the laws, rules, and regulations now in force, or hereinafter to be passed, regulating the organization and management of the penitentiaries and the convicts therein or belonging thereto, and especially subject to the provisions of Art. XV, Art. XVIII, and Art. XX of the rules and regulations of the penitentiaries.

Witness our hands this the 27th day of July, A. D. 1907.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, never since the history of political parties began in this country has there been a minority party which in time of war furnished a parallel to the attitude presented by the Republican Party toward the present administration from the very beginning of this the greatest war of all time.

During all previous wars the party in power was beset by a constant and many times controlling opposition of the minority party. This opposition was not only evidenced in the Congress of the United States in attempts made to thwart the purpose of the administration by the minority party there, but the same opposition was voiced throughout the country by those of like political faith for the purpose of embarrassing and defeating, if possible, the aims of the administration then in power.

During the Revolutionary War, when the first great fight was made to establish a republican form of government, where people should have the right to participate in framing the laws under which they live and where freedom of speech and freedom of conscience should be guaranteed to everyone, the Colonial Party met with the united opposition of the Tory Party, which advocated the doctrine that kings reigned by right divine, and that the voice of the king should be the law of the land. After long years of hardship and untold suffering our patriotic forefathers succeeded in spite of this opposition and commenced the building of a Government that is now the marvel of the world, and the virtues of which are now being appreciated as never before by all the civilized nations of the earth.

In 1812, when as a Nation we were yet weak and when there were but few other nations that respected our rights either on the land or the sea, and when the outrages inflicted upon us could no longer be endured, and to right those wrongs the second war with the mother country was waged, the then Democratic Party—which was in the minority, the Federalist Party being in the majority—with all its might and main opposed our entering into that war and continued to oppose its prosecution until it was brought to a close without having accomplished any of the purposes for which it was originally entered upon. Albert E. Gallatin, one of the great political leaders of that time, while admitting that our wrongs were grievous, yet declared that, because of our unpreparedness to cope with the adversary, we should submit; that it was better for us to redress our own wrongs than to attempt to right them by war.

In 1846 the Democrats were in control of this Government and waged the War with Mexico. This war was opposed bitterly by the Whig Party, who were in the minority. They based their opposition to that war upon their belief that it was being prosecuted for territorial aggrandizement and the extension of slavery.

In 1861 the Republican Party succeeded the Democratic Party in power, and with that succession the War of the Rebellion came. During those four long, bloody years the Republican Party received no comfort and no assistance from the Democratic Party either in the Congress of the United States or throughout the North. There were many individual Democrats that stood loyally by the Government and helped to uphold the hands of Lincoln during that strife, without which individual support I am frank to say that in my opinion this war to preserve the Union might have failed. But the Democratic Party, wherever organized in State or Nation, was organized for the purpose of lending aid and comfort to the rebellion and for the destruction of the Union.

In 1862 the Democratic Party gained control of the State of Indiana, and they put every obstacle that their ingenuity could invent against the further prosecution of the war. The legislature held in 1863 adjourned without appropriating a single dollar to defray the expense of the State incident to the war, and had it not been for the patriotic devotion of Governor Oliver P. Morton to the cause of the Union in borrowing money on his own credit and pledging the future credit of the State there is no telling but what even Indiana would have been lost to the Union cause. [Applause on the Republican side.] The same condition which prevailed in Indiana at that time also prevailed in Illinois, and in many other States of the North where the Democratic Party for the time being gained the ascendency.

The election of 1862 was in an off year, just the same as the election this year is in an off year. Then Democratic State conventions, in the various States throughout the North, resolved against the further prosecution of the war and in favor of its being brought to an immediate close.

Has any one heard of a Republican State convention during this year declaring that our entry into this war was a mistake and that we should withdraw our support from the allies, or that we should cease in our efforts short of a complete and lasting peace based upon victory?

The feeling entertained by the Democratic Party in the several States of the North throughout the Civil War found combined expression in the Democratic national platform adopted at Chicago in 1864, at a time when this country was bleeding from every pore, after three long years of internecine warfare, and when it was not known from one day to the next whether this Union could longer survive. The support then given by the minority party to the party of Lincoln is voiced in the following resolutions adopted by that convention:

Resolved, That this convention does explicitly declare as the sense of the American people that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, during which, under the pretense of a military necessity or war power higher than the Constitution, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every part, and public liberty and private right alike trodden down and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired—justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities, with a view to the ultimate convention of the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest practicable moment peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of States.

Resolved, That the aim and object of the Democratic Party is to preserve the Federal Union and the rights of the States unimpaired, and they hereby declare that they consider that the administrative usurpation of extraordinary and dangerous powers not granted by the Constitution—the supervision of the civil by military law in States not in insurrection; the arbitrary military arrest, imprisonment, trial, and sentence of American citizens in States where civil law exists in full force; the suppression of freedom of speech and the press; the denial of the right of asylum; the open and avowed disregard of State rights; the employment of unusual test oaths; and the interference with and denial of the right of the people to bear arms in their defense—is calculated to prevent a restoration of the Union and the perpetuation of a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed.

Contrast the position of the national Democratic Party then, as expressed by these resolutions, with the position of the national Republican Party now, as expressed in the ringing words of patriotism given to the country by Republican National Chairman Will H. Hays, when a few days ago he announced the position of the Republican Party during the continuance of this war:

Let me emphasize what our first purpose signifies. It means, primarily, that at this moment, the greatest of all the crises in our history, when the Republican Party finds the control of the Government in other hands, it still sinks deeper into the soul of the Nation in becoming the dominant war party, pledging ourselves to give the last of our blood and our treasure, if necessary, to win the war and to win it now. We pledge ourselves forever against an inconclusive peace. And at every moment of faltering on the part of those in power we instantly pick up the guerdon of battle and cry "Carry on." [Applause on the Republican side.]

To this doctrine the Republican Party in every State of the Union subscribes with whole heart and without reserve. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Be it said to the everlasting credit of Gen. George B. McClellan, who was nominated by the Democratic convention which unanimously adopted the foregoing resolutions, that he repudiated them in the following patriotic words:

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the Army and Navy, who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we so often periled our lives.

On the 8th day of April, 1864, just a year and a week before Lee surrendered at Appomattox, a Democratic Representative, Alexander Long, from Vallandigham's State, Ohio, in this very Chamber, was bold to utter a speech teeming with treason from beginning to end, from which I quote the following:

Will they—

throw down their arms and submit to the terms? Who shall believe that the free, proud American blood which courses with as quick pulsation through their veins as our own will not be spilled to the last drop in resistance? Can the Union be restored by war? I answer unhesitatingly and deliberately, No!

War is final, eternal separation. I am reluctantly and despondingly forced to the conclusion that the Union is lost, never to be restored. * * * I see in neither North nor South any sentiment on which it is possible to build a Union. * * * In attempting to preserve our jurisdiction over the Southern States we have lost our constitutional form of government over the northern. The very idea upon which this war is founded, coercion of States, leads to despotism. I now believe there are but two alternatives, and they are either an acknowledgment of the independence of the South as an independent nation, or their complete subjugation and extermination as a people, and of these alternatives I prefer the former.

On the next day after this remarkable speech was uttered, Schuyler Colfax, of the State of Indiana, then Speaker of this House, came down on the floor from the Speaker's platform, and offered a resolution for the expulsion of Representative Long because of these treasonable utterances. To-day it seems almost unbelievable that a man who would make such a speech as Long made against the Government of the United States could find anyone in this body to support him. Yet his supporters were so numerous that this resolution of expulsion failed. When it failed, Mr. Colfax introduced another resolution censuring Representative Long as being an unworthy Member of the House of Representatives. And, strange to say, there were 69 out of a total of 80 Members on the Democratic side who voted against the adoption even of this mild resolution, thus showing that his sentiments, voiced, as they had been, in this treasonable speech, were the same sentiments entertained by them.

What do you suppose would happen to any man on the Republican side of this Chamber who dared to give utterance to such a treasonable speech to-day? He never would be able to complete it. Before he proceeded to the uttering of one-half the words I have quoted the righteous indignation of this House, expressed by Republicans and Democrats alike, would find a way to stop him; and a resolution offered to expel him, in my opinion, would receive the unanimous vote of this body. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In 1898, after long and patient endeavor on the part of the United States Government to bring about an amicable settlement of the political differences existing between Spain and her island possession, Cuba, and after the sinking of the Maine, which had gone as a peace messenger into the harbor of Habana, and when the outrages which were so defiantly perpetrated by Spain could not longer be endured, and war was declared—not for the purpose of territorial expansion, but waged for humanity's sake alone—what was the attitude then of the Democratic minority party in the Congress of the United States? It was proposed to issue bonds to the amount of $600,000,000 to defray the expense of that war. Did the Democrats then stand solidly behind the Republican administration in voting this issue? Unfortunately, no. There were but six Members on the Democratic side whose loyalty to country rose above their loyalty to party, and who cast their lot with the Republican majority. And these six were held in such profound contempt by their Democratic associates here that it was sought by no less a Member of this body than our now honored Speaker, CHAMP CLARK, and by Senator LEWIS, now of Illinois, then a Member of this House from the State of Washington, to read them out of the party. The opposition of the minority party, offered at the very threshold of that war, continued to the end, and villification was constantly heaped upon the head of that great, good man, William McKinley, denouncing him as a usurper of power and that his purpose in waging that war was for the establishment of an empire.

Contrast this attitude of the Democratic Party with the attitude of the Republican Party during the progress of this war. There has not been a single appropriation bill offered upon this floor but what has received the united support of the Republican Members. Some constructive criticism has been offered, because individual Members felt that the measure under consideration might be improved, but when it came to a vote there was no opposition offered to the passage of the measure from the Republican side.

I could not help but admire, and I know that every Member present admired, the declaration made by our colleague, Mr. FORDNEY, of Michigan, when discussing the present revenue bill, that it is his intention to vote for this measure no matter what amendments might be made to it and no matter how much he might differ from the policy embodied in it as to the best means of raising revenue. In making this declaration he voiced the unanimous sentiment of the Republican side, who from the beginning of this war have subordinated their personal ideas for the good of our common country. [Applause on Republican side.] Whatever criticism has been offered on the various essential war measures, none has been made for the purpose of defeating them but for the purpose of improving them, and the whole country knows that time and time again has this criticism resulted in great good. It will be a sorry day for this country and for the progress of this war should the time ever come when honest, constructive criticism can not be uttered upon this floor.

So faithful and reliable has been the support of the Republican Members of this House since the beginning of this war in behalf of the measures necessary for its successful prosecution that leaders on the Republican side have had to take charge on more than one occasion of the management and passage of these measures through the House. This was notably true with reference to the conscription bill, which was opposed by a majority of the Military Affairs Committee, including its chairman, and its success in passing this House, according to the declaration of our Speaker, Mr. CLARK, was attributable more to the efforts of our colleague, JULIUS KAHN, than any other Member. [Applause on Republican side.]

Are we not therefore justified in saying that the attitude of the Republican Party toward this administration is without a parallel in the political history of this country?

Yet, notwithstanding this unselfish devotion and unanimous support so freely and ungrudgingly given by the Republican Party in this House, those who are in charge of the immediate and future welfare of the Democratic Party are proclaiming that this is their war; that they should be the heir to all its political advantages; and that the most of it should be made for political purposes.

No less a personage than our Vice President, the Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL, a few weeks ago, when sounding the keynote in the Democratic campaign in the State of Indiana, said, "This war is a Democratic asset." This he said with the full knowledge of the attitude of the Republican minority not only in this House but in the Senate in supporting the administration in the successful prosecution of this war.

What a mighty change has come over this statesman in two short years. In the campaign of 1916, Mr. MARSHALL declared, in a public address, that every person who voted for Mr. Hughes for President of the United States should go to the nearest enlisting station and enlist, for his election meant war. And he further declared that if we wished to stay out of this war the people should vote for the reelection of President Wilson, who had so successfully kept us out of war and who would continue to do so if reelected.

That the administration kept us out of war was the asset in 1916 upon which Mr. MARSHALL and his party relied. Not only was this proclaimed by the Vice President as their asset, but it was likewise proclaimed by President Wilson, who gave utterance to these words in his Shadow Lawn speech, delivered October 21, 1916:

> I am not expecting this country to get into war. I know that the way in which we have preserved peace is objected to, and that certain gentlemen say that they would have taken another way that would inevitably have resulted in war, but I am not expecting this country to get into war partly because I am not expecting those gentlemen to have a chance to make a mess of it.

The assertion that President Wilson had kept and would continue to keep us out of war, and the charge that if the Republicans were successful they would plunge us into war, were the direct and conclusive issues upon which the Democratic Party succeeded in 1916. This fact I do not think any one now will seriously deny. Is it not, therefore, pertinent to inquire, If the Republican Party was the war party then, what has happened to make it any the less the war party now? [Applause on Republican side.] If the Democratic Party was the preeminent party of peace that it professed itself to be then, why should it be accepted now as the sole possessor of all the martial spirit and of all the militant knowledge and efficiency in the land?

We are now told that at the very time the Democratic press and the Democratic orators were so successfully administering their "he kept us out of the war" soothing drops to the voters of this country, those who were in charge of the administration of this Government were in possession of facts that convinced them then that our getting into this war sooner or later was inevitable. These facts, however, were not confided to the voters prior to the election of 1916, and not a single move was made by those in possession of these facts to prepare for the inevitable.

In view of all this a great many people over this country have wondered, and are now wondering, as to what the attitude of the Democrats would have been toward the Republican administration in the event it had succeeded in 1916 and the war had come on as it did.

If the history of the past is the guide that marks our future and affords us the means upon which to base our judgment, is it not fair to suppose that there would not have been found in this hall, or throughout the country, the same unanimity of purpose in support of the administration that is found today?

The Democratic organizations are in every State in the North putting forth their supremest efforts to elect a Democratic majority to the next House of Representatives, and are using as their battle cry for this purpose, "Stand behind the President; give him a majority of his own party followers, upon whom he can depend to support his war measures." And we are being constantly reminded of the language attributed to Lincoln in the campaign of 1864, that "we should not swap horses while crossing the stream"; also to the language used by Theodore Roosevelt and former President Harrison, in the second McKinley campaign, that the President should have a majority of his own party in the Congress to support him.

The answer to these cries is found in the facts that I have attempted to relate: First, the minority party in Lincoln's time was doing everything in the world to embarrass him and to defeat the cause for which war was being waged. Second, the minority party in McKinley's time was doing all it could to embarrass the administration and to defeat the exalted purpose for which the war with Spain was waged. Third, the minority party now is standing behind this administration with even greater unanimity than the majority party is supporting him. So if the advice given in Lincoln's or in McKinley's time is to find responsive expression through the voice of the people this fall in the election of a Congress that will stand behind the administration and in favor of the prosecution of the war to a peace based upon victory, rather than to "a peace without victory," the Republicans will have a splendid majority in the next House and a good working majority in the Senate after the 4th of March, 1919.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to have been overlooked by the gentleman that at one time when a number of Democratic Members resigned to take office in New York the House of Representatives was virtually Republican, and no effort was made by the Republican Members to embarrass or take any advantage of the administration at that time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am very glad you have stated this fact.

Then, as now, the Republican Party will be found standing true to its traditions. It was born of devotion to country and was baptized with the blood that saved and preserved the Union. In its 64 years of existence it has stood steadfast, supporting the Government in every crisis. It is standing solidly in support of it now; it will continue so to stand until this war is over and the victory is won; a victory that will bring a conclusive and lasting peace; a peace worthy of the sacrifice that our country will make of her sons and her treasure. With no other kind of peace will the Republican Party be content. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the speech by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], who has just closed, and the speech by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], made here this afternoon, have moved me to say a few words at this time. I could not help but notice not only the adroit and skillful effort made by these gentlemen to inject into this debate the partisanship which exists between the parties of to-day, but also the skillful effort to stir up the bitterness and the strife of 60 years ago. One of these gentlemen made a bitter, abusive, and personal attack upon Mr. Burleson, the Postmaster General, a member of the Cabinet, who enjoys the confidence and shares the responsibility of this Government with our President. The other gentleman went back to the Civil War and read the Democratic platform of 1864.

As the son of a Union soldier, as one who has the honor to represent a district where live to-day many survivors from both sides of that tragic struggle of long ago, I desire to resent on behalf of them this kind of speech making. While some were wrangling here over petty politics and rural carriers, and while some were trying to inject the bitterness of the Civil War, the news came from the White House that at 4 o'clock this very morning the American Army had started its greatest offensive. On this very morning the "sons of the men who wore the tattered gray and marched to the tune of 'Way Down South in Dixie,' and the sons of the men who wore the blue and marched to the tune of 'Yankee Doodle,'" the sons of men from the North and South, the East and West, all dressed in khaki, commanded by that great soldier, Gen. Pershing, went over the top inspired by the one thought, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." [Applause.] They went over and they did not stop. While some here were talking about the strife of 60 years ago these boys were marching forward with the same courage as the men who followed Stonewall Jackson and Robert E. Lee. They were marching with the same courage as their fathers, who stood like adamant with old Pap Thomas at Chickamauga and who fought with that silent soldier, Ulysses S. Grant, at Spotsylvania and Cold Harbor. They are on their way. They are going toward Berlin. They are on German soil this afternoon. [Applause.]

And I want to say for the people I represent that I do not think they would care to listen this afternoon to a speech about what happened in 1861. They do not care whether a postmaster has been dismissed or whether the rural carriers are pleased with the Postmaster General. The hearts of the people I represent are on the other side of the sea this afternoon. Their hopes are over there. Their prayers are for the boys who are over there. And we in this Chamber at this solemn hour do not honor ourselves or our country by indulging in this petty, bitter political bickering and controversy. [Applause.] I do not know what the future holds for me, but this I do know: That while the boys I represent are 3,000 miles away, fighting for that flag, fighting for my country, fighting against the most deadly, the most treacherous, the most powerful, the most brutal despotism that ever existed on this earth, I shall not stand in the American Congress and seek political or partisan advantage. I scorn to try to win a seat in this Hall by impugning the patriotism of loyal men. I want to testify, though no testimony is needed, that the Republicans of the district I have the honor to represent are just as loyal to their country and just as patriotic as the Democrats, and I resent the insinuation made here that Democrats are not just as patriotic and as loyal as the Republicans. No Republican politician need think he is going to win advantage in 1918 by talking about Vallandigham and what he did in 1861 or by referring to the Democratic platform of 1864. Republicans and Democrats have boys on the other side. Their shoulders touch as they march along. Their hearts are joined in mutual courage as they charge. They are falling side by side this afternoon and side by side they lie on the battle field. Side by side they pray to God and side by side they die and in the same graves they will sleep. Many of the boys I have the honor to represent are down on that end of the line this afternoon. Side by side their mothers pray for their safety and return, and side by side their fathers, with grim faces and brave, proud hearts, hope that victory may be with the lads they love. [Applause.]

I would not presume to criticize my colleagues, but with due respect to all I believe we should stop this bickering, this partisanship. I believe that we should keep in mind that the boys we love have started the greatest battle in which Americans ever engaged. The people of the country are not thinking of politics. Let us eliminate it from this debate and let us pass this revenue bill, which provides $8,000,000,000 to back up the boys who have started toward Berlin. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask leave to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, assertions that the Republicans have been and are now even more unanimous and loyal in their support of the administration than Democrats have been falling thick as leaves in Valambrosa for the last several months on the floor of this House. That kind of claim is always made the basis of arguments in favor of Republican success in the pending election. And yet gentlemen on the other side nearly always blow hot and cold. Every time they make these perfervid assertions of loyalty to and support of the administration in all its war measures they conclude, before they leave the floor, with bitter or shrewd or keen criticisms of the administration. In one breath they claim credit for what the administration has accomplished and in the next they criticize every branch of the Government. They seek to excuse themselves for these criticisms on the ground that they have a right to offer constructive criticism, which is true. That was the preface to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] the other day, yet he took no particle of his time to offer any constructive criticism, but one solid hour in carping, special criticism of the President and the administration. I have observed the criticisms and attacks of other Members of this body and of the other body, and they all begin with professions of their undying and unbounded allegiance and loyalty to the Government.

After that breath leaves their nostrils every other breath is devoted to the destruction or weakening of the administration in the estimation of the American public, and charges that even the President is seeking power for political and not patriotic reasons. Why, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who on the floor to-day attacked the Postmaster General, first began by proclaiming his allegiance to the administration and then he delivered a prepared and written address of nearly an hour solely devoted to a bitter personal attack on one of the members of the Cabinet, the Postmaster General. He first attacked him for bitter partisanship. Mr. Burleson, it is true, is and always has been a hundred per cent Democrat, and has fought the battles of his party in campaigns and in Congress for 20 years, but he has never indulged in vituperation or personal slander and abuse. And who on this floor has ever seen a bitterer partisan than the gentleman making this attack? The Postmaster General comes from my State. I have known him long. He is earnest and true. He has had the nerve to stand sometimes against what the great body of letter carriers have urged, but in doing so has simply enforced the law and shown his devotion to duty as he saw it. And the man who joins an attack on him for doing his duty with a studied compilation of malignant personal abuse is abusing his high office. He charges Mr. Burleson with cruelty and inhumanity to convicts on a farm owned by him and leased to the State of Texas in 1907. If there was any cruelty, Mr. Burleson was as little responsible for it as the gentleman from Minnesota. Since 1907 the people of Mr. Burleson's district have elected and reelected him to Congress without opposition, while if there had been a shadow of truth in the charges here made against him he could not have been elected to any office. Surely no one can doubt the friendly desire on the part of gentlemen like this one from Minnesota to strengthen and sustain the administration! As to the charges of poor service and delays in delivering mail to our boys over there I want to read a letter from the War Department to Hon. J. J. Mansfield, of Texas. It shows that the gentleman ought to have poured out his wrath on Gen. Pershing, if upon anybody; but that would not have suited his purpose.

Here is the letter:

AUGUST 28, 1918.

Hon. J. J. MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: The Secretary of War desires me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 26, 1918, relative to the great number of complaints you are receiving from parents who have sons in the Army in France regarding the nonreceipt of mail by their boys, and in response thereto I beg leave to inform you that there are great numbers of letters going overseas to soldiers in France every week, and as the organizations to which they belong are being constantly shifted about from one sector to another, from camp to camp, and from billet to billet, it becomes a very difficult task to deliver the huge volume of mail without a corresponding delay due to the unusual difficulties encountered. However, according to information contained in cabled reports from Gen. Pershing, arrangements are now being put into effect by the postal branch of the American Expeditionary Forces under Gen. Pershing, in cooperation with the Post Office Department, to facilitate and to expedite to the greatest practicable degree the delivery of mail to and from abroad. These arrangements provide that the Post Office Department shall pouch mail for organizations and deliver it so pouched to the Army at embarkation points in the United States, the mail to be then transported by Army transports and delivered through Army channels to the soldiers. In like manner the mail from France is to be collected by the Army, pouched, and delivered to the Post Office Department at ports of embarkation in France, transported on Government transports to the United States, and delivered by the Post Office Department here. Gen. Pershing reports that he is making every effort to perfect the mail service under his control so that mail will be delivered promptly.

The money-order system is operated exclusively in France by the Post Office Department. The Army authorities in France are rapidly perfecting their postal system, and an improvement has been noticed already in the lessening of congestion of the mail. This new system that is being put into effect will, it is hoped, serve to eliminate to a large degree complaints relative to the nonreceipt of mail to and from abroad.

If the soldier does not get his letters separately, he may receive them collectively, but they will eventually reach him, if properly addressed.

If letters are marked plainly with the name and organization in full, the words "American Expeditionary Force" at the bottom of the envelope, and the name and address of the writer in the upper left-hand corner they will be taken care of and delivered, if within the power of the authorities.

Very truly, yours,

STANLEY KING,
Private Secretary.

It is a shameful fact that criticism, not constructive criticism, but bitter, partisan criticism and denunciation, has been indulged in at both ends of this Capitol, for political effect, against the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the Postmaster General, the Federal Trade Commission, and nearly every other department and bureau of the Government, and the men who indulge in it are loudest in their professions of loyalty. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to prick this bubble of professed loyalty to the administration on the part of many Republicans, and this claim that as a party the Republicans are more loyal than the Democrats, and that the President has had to depend on Republicans to put his measures through. Let us see how the evidence stands in some of the record votes. A bill to raise revenue is a keystone, a touchstone. What do we find as to such votes? I find that in the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress the revenue bill, on final passage, was voted for by 199 Democrats and against by no Democrats; was voted against by 142 Republicans and for by 39 Democrats.

Mr. BLANTON. You mean Republicans?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; I mean it was voted for by 39 Republicans and voted against by 142 Republicans. I want Republicans who are loud in their professions of loyalty on that side to have an opportunity to say how they voted. Among those who voted against this bill was the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], who last professed his loyalty to-day, as was also the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], who just the other day spent five minutes in professing his loyalty and an hour in criticizing the administration. [Applause.]

On the shipping bill, one of the important preparedness measures passed by this House in the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, 203 Democrats voted for it and 1 against it. It was voted for by 6 Republicans and against by 160 Republicans. It was fought by the private shipping and shipbuilding interests. The gentleman who last addressed you, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, was one of those voting against it. It was also voted against by Mr. RODENBERG and Mr. GOOD, who recently loudly proclaimed his loyalty while attacking the administration.

On the motion to table the McLemore resolution 180 Democrats voted for tabling and 31 against; 96 Republicans voted to table it and 111 against tabling. Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. RODENBERG, Mr. MILLER of Minnesota, and Mr. GOOD all voted against tabling. And yet these gentlemen have the effrontery to tell us that this administration is more beholden to the Republican side than it is to the Democratic side! That was the claim of the last gentleman who addressed the House, Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What else do I find? I find that the revenue bill of the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress was voted for by 211 Democrats and against by 4 Democrats, and voted for by no Republicans and against by 192 Republicans. Surely the administration is beholden to the Republicans for passing that bill! Just where the Republicans, if given a majority in this House, would lead us or tie us up nobody knows; but that they would often tie the hands of the President on some specious pretext few men with sober judgment will question. Since all revenue measures must originate in the House, a Republican House would have a powerful weapon against the President.

Then, I find that the Cooper amendment, which has cut some little figure in the political affairs of this country—it was to prohibit ships that were armed for their own protection from carrying munitions to belligerent nations and was an infraction of international law in the interest of Germany—the Cooper amendment was voted for by 47 Democrats and against by 171; it was voted for by 76 Republicans, including Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. RODENBERG, and Mr. GOOD, and against by 122 Republicans. The author of this amendment was a Republican, and it received nearly twice as many Republican as Democratic votes.

Now, in the explosives act, carrying provisions intended to protect America against explosions and crippling acts planned by German plotters, section 3 provided for the only means of enforcing the bill. A motion to strike out section 3 was made. Ten Democrats voted for it, 157 voted against it. One hundred and forty-six Republicans voted for and 8 against that motion to strike out that section 3, and among those voting for were all four of the gentlemen I have named; and without section 3 the bill was barren. I am naming these gentlemen because they are the most recent examples of denunciation of the administration and protestation of loyal support on the floor of the House. There are many others whose records ought to be shown.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDY. No; I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman will pardon me. I want to put some things in the RECORD. At the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress Mr. FORDNEY moved to recommit the revenue bill of that session with instructions to strike out all excess-profits tax. One Democrat voted yea; 213 voted nay; 186 Republicans voted yea, and only 6 voted nay. Mr. WOOD, Mr. MILLER, Mr. RODENBERG, and Mr. GOOD all voted yea. They did not want the excessive profits of wealth properly taxed.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to include in my remarks a table showing how Republicans and Democrats have voted on test measures, taken from the RECORD, and then let some one get up and say that the Republican Party has been more uniformly loyal than the Democratic Party. [Applause.] We have had that statement handed to us from time to time, and gentlemen on that side are trying to coin their professed loyalty into votes in November. I am showing that they blow hot and cold, profess their loyal allegiance one moment and the next moment make vicious attacks upon this and that branch of the Government, not even hesitating to reach up to the White House itself and endeavor to pull down the President in the estimation of the American people. [Applause.] I hold in my hand a table showing votes cast and an explanation of those votes, which I will insert in my remarks:

Motion to recommit on Cooper amendment.[6]	do	125	293	47	171	76	122	4691	Yes	Yes	No	Yes.

[1] To recommit with instructions to incorporate a protective tariff.
[2] To appropriate $20,000,000 for armor-plate plant. This caused great reduction in price paid by Navy for armor plate.
[3] This was filibustered to death in 1915 in Senate, but was passed in both Houses in 1916.
[4] This was for revenue needed for Mexican war situation and to meet decrease of revenue because of war in Europe.
[5] Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fourth Congress of the United States do, and it hereby solemnly does, request the President to warn all American citizens, within the borders of the United States or its possessions or elsewhere, to refrain from traveling on any or all ships of any and all of the powers now or in future at war, which ship or ships shall mount guns, whether such ship be frankly avowed a part of the naval forces of the power whose flag it flies or shall be called a merchant ship or otherwise, and whether such gun or other armament be called "offensive" or "defensive;" and in case American citizens do travel on such armed belligerent ships that they do so at their own risk.
[6] Amendment prohibited armed American ships carrying munitions to belligerent nations.

[1] A bill to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, and for other purposes. Motion made to recommit and strike out the following: "When the United States is at war the publishing wilfully of any information with respect to the movement of troops, numbers, or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations or with respect to any of the works intended for the fortifications or defense of any place which information is useful to the enemy is hereby prohibited."

[2] Section 3 provided that the Bureau of Mines, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to utilize all the offices of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and municipalities in the execution of this act. Without it the act could not be enforced.

[3] This was to recommit without instructions and thus kill the bill.

[4] This vote was a bold attempt to kill the bill.

[5] This was Mr. LONGWORTH's motion.

Figures and words in italics are the bad votes.

Let me give you also a few citations of votes in the Sixty-third Congress. I do not give the votes of Progressives or any votes except those of Republicans and Democrats:

First session. Federal reserve banks (H. R. 7837): Democrats, yea 249, nay 4; Republicans, yea 0, nay 67.

Second session. Against unlawful restraints and monopolies (H. R. 15657): Democrats, yea 219, nay 1; Republicans, yea 39, nay 52.

Second session. Emergency revenue, "war tax" (H. R. 18891): Democrats, yea 233, nay 10; Republicans, yea 0, nay 90.

Second session. War-risk insurance, marine insurance (S. 6357): Democrats, yea 196, nay 3; Republicans, yea 27, nay 48.

Second session. Banking and currency, on conference report (H. R. 7837): Democrats, yea 248, nay 2; Republicans, yea 31, nay 57.

Third session. Ship purchase (S. 5259), for Navy mail lines: Democrats, yea 209, nay 17; Republicans, yea 0, nay 84.

I do not now comment on the votes in the Sixty-third Congress, but I wish to condense and lay stress on certain facts shown by the votes given in the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses.

(1) The Republicans voted against the first general revenue bill, Sixty-fourth Congress, by 142 to 39, and against the second general revenue bill of that Congress by 192 to 0.

(2) They voted against the armor plant by 133 to 44, while Democrats voted for it by 192 to 2.

(3) They voted against the Shipping Board bill, under which we are building our merchant marine, by 160 to 6, while Democrats voted for it by 203 to 1.

(4) They voted for the railroad eight-hour law by 68 to 54, while Democrats voted for it by 171 to 2.

(5) On the motion to table the McLemore resolution they voted 96 yeas, 111 nays, while Democrats voted 180 yeas, 31 nays.

(6) At the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress they voted for Mr. FORDNEY's motion to strike all excess profits tax by 186 to 6.

(7) They cast nearly twice as many votes for the Cooper amendment as did the Democrats, and they cast twice as many votes against the declaration of war as did the Democrats.

(8) They defeated the provision in the espionage act for press censorship to prevent the exposure of our troop movements, and so forth, by casting 146 votes for and 11 votes against striking it from the bill, while Democrats cast 38 votes for and 133 votes against striking it out.

(9) They tried to emasculate the explosives act by voting to strike out section 3 by a vote of 146 to 8.

(10) Seventy-six of them voted against the general revenue bill of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, against which no Democrat voted.

In the face of these votes it is brazen for Republicans to claim that they have loyally supported the President's war policies. Consequently, they never refer to these votes or votes like them.

The Republicans made great efforts to manufacture campaign thunder by offering claptrap amendments to the administration Army bill in 1916, and these are what they are going to dwell on in this campaign. I am going to present one of them. The bill proposed to increase the standing Army to 175,000 men. This was to be not its war strength but its permanent peace strength. Mr. KAHN, Republican, of California, moved to amend by making it 220,000 instead of 175,000. Whatever increase should be made had to be obtained by volunteer enlistment under existing law, at $15 per month. It was known to everybody that it would be very difficult to get even 175,000 men.

The amendment was denounced and well understood to be mere camouflage. Mr. MCKENZIE, Republican, of Illinois, and others, showed it to be only pretense. The amendment was defeated and the bill passed, retaining the provision to fix the size of the standing Army at 175,000. This was about August, 1916, and under it the War Department tried every way to secure the desired increase. Up to April, 1917, they had only been able to secure about 20,000 increase. They could not have secured a single man more if the Kahn amendment had been adopted. These facts were given great consideration when war was declared and the policy of the Government as to conscription was to be determined, and also the pay of the private soldier raised. The Kahn amendment, under the law as to enlistment and pay as it then existed, and which the amendment did not propose to change, was as experience proved absolutely immaterial. Yet Republicans have not failed to claim that if it had been adopted we would have had a great many more soldiers in Europe to-day, a claim that is absolutely false.

In this campaign Republicans may try to make great capital out of the fact that on the question of conscription as against the volunteer plan of raising an army Mr. KAHN, Republican, led the fight on the floor in favor of the former, while Mr. DENT, Democrat, led those favoring the volunteer plan. On that question the vote was overwhelming—313 to 109 in favor of conscription. There were 62 Democrats and 45 Republicans voting for the volunteer plan. Both parties were overwhelmingly for conscription, but no honest man questions the purity and patriotism of any man who voted for the volunteer plan because of that vote.

There was no question of loyalty to the administration involved. It was simply a question of how we could quickest and best raise the great army we needed and which all of us wanted; and, led by the President, public sentiment and the sentiment in Congress, without regard to party, grew to be overwhelmingly in favor of conscription.

In many cases a majority of the Republicans have voted for and in many cases against the policies of the administration. I believe the record will bear out the statement that they have always carried a knife up their sleeves for the President, and that they are anxious to slaughter him by all sorts of criticism during the pending campaign, even though the slaughter will bring rejoicing to the Kaiser and every German sympathizer in Europe and America.

Now, one other question. The question is asked whether the Republicans ought to want control of the next House, if they do want it, and the very pertinent question is asked, What would they do with it? Of course, it is human nature that they should want it. But should the country give them control of the next House, and why should they want it? Let me tell you. It is altogether possible that this war may end before the duties and services of the next elected House of Representatives shall end, and if it does, then within that time will begin the period of the readjustment and reorganization of the social and political status and of the industrial conditions of this country.

The period of construction, as it were, will come. For that period no less than for the conduct of the war during the war the great breadth of vision and statesmanship of the man in the White House to-day will serve his country under God as this country believes no other man can. [Applause.] Take the great measures, both war and peace measures of this administration, all the serious criticisms of them, all the blocking of them comes from that side of the aisle. In the hour of reconstruction and readjustment that must follow as the aftermath of the war, is it well to saddle the President with a hostile majority in the House of Representatives, to clog the wheels of legislation or to reverse the course of legislation? The popular reforms that swept Woodrow Wilson into power in 1913 were not and are not popular with the stand-pat Republicans, who dominate that party to-day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. No; I can not yield. I have not the time. I know that after the great war between the States there were many war measures upon the statute books. To carry on that war it was necessary to tax wealth as well as to tax poverty, and the tariff and revenue laws were supplemented by great levies upon incomes—the income taxes of that time. Internal-revenue taxes were increased, occupation taxes imposed. The excessive tariff of that day was apologized for with the statement that it was a war measure, and the levy of an income tax was apologized for with the statement that it was a war measure, and the people were promised that the high tariffs would be reduced and that the income-tax law would be repealed when the war was ended. But when the war was ended, faithful to their promise to the wealth of this country, they did repeal the income-tax laws and other laws that bore hard on wealth, but they doubled and piled higher the taxes that went onto the backs of the masses and of the poor. When this war is ended new policies must be mapped out, new measures must be adopted, and every man in this country who believes that Woodrow Wilson should guide things knows that there ought to be at his back a majority that will look forward and not backward, that will say to him, "March on!" [Applause.]

We know that there are scores of reform measures, passed by the Democratic Congress under the direction and guiding hand of Woodrow Wilson, that only await a Republican majority for their repeal.

Oh, it is true that the veto power could prevent the repeal of legislation now upon the statute books unless there was a majority of two-thirds in both Houses; but a majority in this House can lock the wheels of legislation and prevent reform laws being enacted at the request of the President; and, having the power of the purse strings, they can force compromises for the repeal of such laws as a hostile majority would desire and strenuously demand the repeal of. Oh, I have had occasion to look up the record and to find that where war measures necessitate the imposition of burdens upon the rich and the poor, when the war is ended, the rich are always represented asking for the repeal of the measures that weigh heavily upon them, while the poor are not here. Place in this House a majority that has not its great, warm heart throbbing in sympathy with the multitudes, the masses, a majority that goes for its inspiration to the special interests, and you will find a tendency to repeal the laws now on the statute books that weigh heavily on wealth, while the laws that weigh heavily on poverty will be allowed to remain in perpetuity. No wonder that this is so, for wealth never sleeps and the corporations have their paid representatives, as they have a right to do, their able lawyers watching over their interests. I appeal simply to the great masses and multitude of the people of the United States to say whether, when this war ends, they want the guiding hand of Woodrow Wilson, assisted by a friendly majority in the House of Representatives, to help them reform and rehabilitate and build up this country under the new conditions that will then arise.

Under Democratic control wealth is bearing its just share of the burdens of this war. We are going to have an expenditure of four to five billions of dollars per annum after the war. Even a Republican tariff has never raised one-tenth of that sum, and it never can unless you begin to tax all the necessities of the poor man that have been free. Even then, we could never raise a billion of dollars by the tariff. How, then, will the other four billions and more be raised? The Republicans want to be in power when the day of levying those taxes comes in peace times. If the Democrats remain in power, the people know how the taxes will be raised. Eighty per cent of them will be raised by income taxes and corporation taxes and excess-profits taxes. If the Republican Party return to power how will they be raised? Who can say? The income tax, the corporation tax, the excess-profits tax are the children of Democratic teaching and toil.

The Republican Party will prove but a harsh stepfather to these children. If the people wish to go back to the policies of ancient stand-pat Republicanism, and at the same time send the message to Germany that America is not back of her President, let them elect a Republican Congress. If they wish to retain the fruits of all the reforms, so hardly won under the present administration, and send word to Germany that America backs the President, let them elect a Democratic Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD addressed the committee.

During the remarks of Mr. GOOD the following occurred:

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. GOOD. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Texas has a right to make a point of order that no quorum is present; the Constitution requires a quorum to be present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The Chair will count. Forty-eight Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise.

The question was being taken, when Mr. KITCHIN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 1 aye and 57 noes.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, that 224 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the names of the absentees for printing in the RECORD and the Journal in accordance with the rule.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the speech made a few days ago by the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. FERRIS, is both remarkable and important. It is remarkable because it announces an entire reversal of the principles upon which the Democratic Party has gone to the people in the past two campaigns; it is important because it was made by the chairman of the Democratic congressional committee, who is intrusted with carrying on the Democratic campaign this fall in every congressional district throughout the country and indicates his party's position in this campaign. That utterance, therefore, should receive more than passing notice.

Parties, like men, are measured, not by their promises but by their performances. The man who for profit or place makes a solemn promise and through it gratifies his ambition, and then straightway breaks his word, can not long retain the respect of his neighbors. So, too, the party that stands for a very definite thing before election, and immediately after election repudiates its preelection position and champions the very opposite, can not long retain the confidence and respect of the American electorate. The position taken before the election may have been wrong and the subsequent action right, yet the people will reprove and repudiate the practice of such hypocrisy and deceit.

Since the outbreak of the European war we have held two national elections in which the Members of this House were elected. Clearly do we recall the issue in 1914, when the Democratic textbook contained the title printed in big, black letters: "War in Europe; peace in America; God bless Wilson." That entire campaign was waged from the standpoint of the pacifist.

Again, in the presidential election of 1916 the Democratic Party posed as the peace party of the Nation. Its slogan was: "Wilson's wisdom wins without war." For two years the administration had been carefully setting the stage for that campaign. Every speech on preparedness made on the Democratic side of this House was a pacifist speech. Even the utterances of the President during that period can not be claimed to be in favor of preparedness. It was no less a personage than President Wilson, who, three days after the sinking of the Lusitania, said that we were too proud to fight. Ten months before the last election he said he was inclined to think that Germany had a right to sink armed belligerent merchant ships without warning. Six months before that election President Wilson said that with the causes and objects of the European war we were not concerned. And on the very eve of the election, speaking from Shadow Lawn, the President said:

> I am not expecting this country to get into war. I know that the way in which we have preserved peace is objected to and that certain gentlemen say that they would have taken another way that would inevitably have resulted in war, but I am not expecting this country to get into war partly because I am not expecting those gentlemen to have a chance to make a mess of it.

There can be no question but that the issue raised in the last campaign by the administration in power was that the Democratic Party was the peace party and the Republican Party the war party; that the election of President Wilson and a Democratic Congress meant peace and the election of a Republican President and a Republican Congress meant war. That was the Democratic claim.

Another election is approaching. We are at war. A million and a half of American fathers and mothers have brave sons whom they hold most dear fighting on French soil for humanity and democracy. And if the word that comes to-day from those boys over there is to be relied upon they are giving a good account of themselves. [Applause.] The minds of the voters will scrutinize this fall, as they have never scrutinized before, the action of their Representatives in Congress. They are interested not only in the things they stand for now but in the things they stood for before we entered the war.

The scene, therefore, changes, and according to the gentleman from Oklahoma his great party, which posed as the pacifist party in the last two campaigns, now claims to be the war party, and he would have the country believe that the Republican Party, which they pointed to in 1914 and 1916 as the war party, is in truth and reality the pacifist party. He points to the record of the Democratic Party on preparedness as one without a parallel. In order to muster proof for such a claim it was necessary for the gentleman from Oklahoma to compare the expenditures in the War and Navy Departments under President Wilson while this great war is in progress and while we were at war with Mexico with like expenditures during the administrations of Roosevelt and Taft. He would pass over without notice the hundreds of millions of dollars expended during the Wilson administration in our war with and occupation in Mexico, and claim the entire appropriation for a preparedness program.

But, Mr. Chairman, the attitude of a political party on a great question can not be measured by a single act or by the acts of a single Congress. The things a political party really stands for can only be weighed by an analysis of the party's position covering a period of years. If a party for a period of years continuously voted for a small Navy and never lost an opportunity to weaken and make smaller a small Army which it maintained, that party can not seriously be regarded as a party favoring preparedness. Let us, therefore, adopt a fair test. Let us take the measure of Republicans and Democrats alike in Congress, by the same yardstick, for a period of years, on the great questions of preparedness, and see whether the Democratic Party has, as is claimed by the gentleman from Oklahoma, been the preparedness party in the United States. When any fair test is applied and the result announced the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and his party will regret that he raised this issue.

President Roosevelt laid down during his administration a real naval program. That program provided for the building of two battleships a year, with auxiliary cruisers and other craft necessary to make it a well-rounded fighting force. Whatever of strength the Navy possessed at the outbreak of the war with Germany was due to this program. For 10 years that program has had practically the unanimous support of the Republican membership of this House and it has had almost the unanimous opposition of the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Can the gentleman give us the votes in the Sixtieth Congress—how many Democrats and how many Republicans?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes; the gentleman can get that vote. I have not gone back of the Sixty-first Congress.

During the past 10 years a great many bills and amendments have been voted upon in this Chamber vitally affecting the Army. A comparison of the votes of Republicans with Democrats in the House on such measures will show that Republicans have, in the main, at all times supported measures calculated to strengthen the Army, and that the Democratic side of the House has apparently welcomed every opportunity to weaken that great branch of our national defense. In taking this action our Democratic friends did not lack in patriotism, but only in vision. The record, however, stands as I have indicated, as we shall presently see.

Let us now examine the record in the House since the Sixty-first Congress and apply this test and see whether these deductions I have made are warranted.

THE NAVY.

First, as to the Navy. In the third session of the Sixty-first Congress, when the naval appropriation bill was under discussion, Mr. PADGETT, of Tennessee, offered a motion to recommit the bill, striking out the provision for two first-class battleships and inserting a provision for but one battleship. On this vote the yeas were 137 and the nays were 167. Of those voting for two battleships 121 were Republicans and only 4 were Democrats. Of those voting for one battleship instead of two, 43 were Republicans and 94 were Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 46, pt. 4, p. 3125.)

In the second session of the Sixty-second Congress, when the Democrats had control of the House, an open caucus was held by them and a resolution was passed by a vote of 98 to 68 which provided that no battleships should be ordered constructed during that session of Congress. The resolution in that caucus by which it was attempted to stop battleship construction would have been adopted by a much larger vote but for the fact that it was coupled with the pork-barrel public-buildings bill, and many of the 68 Members who voted against battleship construction were, in fact, as their votes subsequently showed, only opposed to the provision which eliminated the appropriations for public buildings and were not opposed to that part of the resolution which stopped the building of battleships. I shall insert in the RECORD the article which appeared in the Washington Star of January 30, 1912, containing an account of that caucus and the roll call upon the adoption of the resolution.

When the naval appropriation bill was under discussion during that session, Mr. Roberts of Massachusetts moved to recommit the bill with instructions to report it back with a provision for the construction of one first-class battleship. On that vote there were 106 yeas and 140 nays. Ninety-eight Republicans and but eight Democrats voted for one battleship. Voting against the building of a single battleship were 2 Republicans and 138 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 7, p. 7355.)

And so the bill went to the Senate in accordance with the resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus, without containing provision for a single battleship. The Senate added two battleships to the program, and the vote on the conference report for two battleships resulted in 78 yeas and 150 nays. Seventy-one Republicans and only seven Democrats voted for two battleships. Voting against two battleships were 18 Republicans and 132 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 11, p. 11189.)

Speaking against the construction of any battleships on that occasion, Mr. Gray of Indiana said:

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to an appropriation for two battleships. I am opposed to an appropriation for one battleship. I am opposed to any appropriation for battleships. If we are to take our place among the nations of the world as first standing for peace and against war, then we should declare our position by an appropriation for peace and not for war. [Applause.] But if we must appropriate for one battleship to appease the insatiable demands of the militarism of to-day, let us save at least the principle of the cause of mediation and appropriate as much to promote peace as we appropriate to build warships. [Applause.] * * *

This appropriation bill will not only burden the people of our own land, but it will be caught up in the spirit of war and military rivalry by all nations, to be multiplied and weighed upon all the people of the world. It will wrest food from the hungry, clothing from the half-clad and the naked, fuel from the cold and the shivering, and shelter from the homeless and unhoused.

These warships to be built will fill the world with blood, anguish, and devastation if they are used, and their cost will bring want and destitution to the human race, whether they are used or not used.

This speech seems to have struck a responsive chord in the heart of the President, for a little later, in writing a letter to Mr. Gray's campaign manager in a political contest where Mr. Gray's attitude on preparedness was challenged, the President said:

I am very glad, indeed, to reply to your letter of June 15, that the Hon. Finly H. Gray throughout his membership in the House has given the present administration the most generous and cordial support. It would afford me the greatest gratification to see him return to the House of Representatives.

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hence it is seen that your action for a small Navy carried the Presidential approval.

The House having rejected the provision for two battleships in the conference report which I have just referred to, the same matter came before the House again on August 20, 1912. This time the conference report contained a provision for one battleship, instead of two. This report was opposed by Democrats because it contained any provision for battleship construction. On this vote there were 150 yeas and 51 nays, and it is to the credit of the Republican Party that every vote against the building of a single battleship was cast by a Democrat. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 11, p. 11390.)

In the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, when the Naval appropriation bill was under discussion, a motion was made to strike out the provision for two battleships and insert a provision for one battleship. On this vote the yeas were 174 and the nays were 156. One hundred and ten Republicans and but 46 Democrats voted for two battleships. Only 25 Republicans voted for one instead of two battleships, but 148 Democrats voted for one as against two battleships. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 49, pt. 4, p. 4107.)

Later, on the adoption of the conference report on this bill, the question was presented of authorizing the construction of two first-class battleships instead of one, and on this vote there were 144 yeas and 168 nays. Ninety-six Republicans and but 48 Democrats voted for two battleships; 19 Republicans and 149 Democrats voted for one and against two battleships. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 49, pt. 5, p. 4810.)

On March 3, the day before Congress adjourned, the conference report was agreed to, containing a provision for but one battleship instead of two. The pacifists in control of the Democratic Party had their way.

In the Sixty-third Congress, about 60 days before the outbreak of the war in Europe, Mr. Witherspoon offered a motion to recommit the naval appropriation bill, with instructions to report it back with a provision striking out the appropriation for two battleships and inserting an authorization for one battleship. On this vote the yeas were 106 and the nays were 202. Eighty-seven Republicans and 115 Democrats voted for two battleships, 10 Republicans and 96 Democrats voted for one instead of two battleships. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 51, pt. 8, p. 8266.)

In the third session of that Congress Mr. Witherspoon again offered a motion to recommit the appropriation bill, with instructions to strike out the provisions for two battleships and insert a provision for one. On the roll call there were 149 yeas and 165 nays. Eighty-three Republicans and 82 Democrats voted for two battleships instead of one; while only 16 Republicans and 133 Democrats voted for one instead of two battleships. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 52, pt. 3, p. 3152.)

In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress Mr. BROWNING offered a motion to recommit the naval appropriation bill, providing for two first-class battleships and additional craft. On this vote there were 183 yeas and 189 nays. Voting for this measure of preparedness there were 159 Republicans and only 24 Democrats, while voting against it were 14 Republicans and 175 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 2, 1916.)

Again, on the conference report on that bill, which contained a Senate amendment providing for a naval building program, there were 282 yeas and 51 nays. Voting for this amendment were 147 Republicans and 135 Democrats; voting against it were but 15 Republicans and 35 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 15, 1916.)

It must be remembered in this connection that in closing the debate upon that amendment the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], in moving that the House agree to the Senate amendment, said:

I feel I am discharging a wise and patriotic service. In view of the statement that was made early in the debate, I wish to state here that I have been in close touch in conference with the President of the United States, and his whole heart is in this matter, and ever since last September he has advocated a continuous program, and has advocated a program that would meet with the will and wishes of the American people.

Notwithstanding this message from the White House to the Democratic side of the House, there were two Democratic votes for every Republican vote in opposition to that program. Even the party lash could not make preparedness advocates out of pacifist advocates.

The net result of this analysis is that on seven roll calls, when the question was squarely presented whether we should authorize the construction of one or two battleships, Republicans almost unanimously voted for two battleships as against one battleship, while the Democrats voted almost unanimously for but one battleship and against two battleships. On one roll call the question was fairly presented of authorizing the construction of one battleship or no battleships. Two lone Republicans voted against the construction of any battleship, but they had the company of 139 Democrats, who voted against the construction of any battleship whatever. Only eight Democrats voted with the Republicans for one battleship.

In this connection it is interesting to note the attitude of the present preparedness advocate of the administration, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. By reference to the article that appeared in the Washington Star of January 30, 1912, it will be noted that he voted against the elimination of the $16,000,000 pork-barrel building bill, which was coupled with a provision eliminating battleship construction. But his opposition to that motion seems to have been centered on the loss of pork, rather than in the loss of battleships for the American Navy; for he subsequently, on every occasion, when the proposition was advanced to build one battleship or two battleships, voted against two battleships, and for but one battleship. And when the proposition was fairly put to the House for the construction of one battleship or no battleship, he voted against the construction of any battleship.

Having done all this to weaken this first line of America's defense, one would naturally think our Democratic friends, if they really believed just a little in preparedness, would have stopped here, and would have left the Army unimpaired. But such is not the case. As a party it seems that they never missed an opportunity to vote against preparedness in the Army, and constantly voted for those things which would tend to weaken or even destroy this great arm of our defense.

THE ARMY.

In the third session of the Sixty-first Congress the vote on the motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill to increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, by providing for pay for the National Guard in time of peace and for a certain standard of training throughout the year, shows that Members were divided almost strictly along party lines. Practically every Republican voted to increase the efficiency of the Army, and with but few exceptions Democrats were in opposition. One hundred and thirty-four Republicans voted for the bill and but 18 Democrats supported it. Seven Republicans and 99 Democrats opposed it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 46, pt. 4, p. 3228.)

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] appears to have been a pacifist then, for he voted against increasing the efficiency of this branch of the Army.

Two-thirds not having voted in favor of the motion, it was rejected, and the matter came up again on February 26, 1911. Mr Hay, of Virginia, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. On this motion the vote was 116 yeas and 151 nays. Six Republicans and 110 Democrats voted for the motion. Voting against the motion were 135 Republicans and 16 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 46, pt. 4, p. 3710.)

This bill passed the House on March 1, 1911, by a vote of 159 yeas and 125 nays. One hundred and forty-six Republicans and only 13 Democrats voted for the bill; 6 Republicans joined 119 Democrats in opposing this preparedness measure. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 46, pt. 4, p. 3801.)

On February 16, 1912, Mr. Hay, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, offered a motion to abolish five regiments of Cavalry. Think of it! Can it be said that a man or a party who would support that kind of a measure at a time when our standing Army was less than 90,000 could be said to be in favor of preparedness? Only three Republicans voted for this pacifist measure, but 161 Democrats voted for it. It was opposed by 3 lone Democrats, but it had the opposition of 109 Republicans. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 3, p. 2143.)

And again, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] voted with his party to abolish five regiments of Cavalry.

Take the Hay amendment to the Army appropriation bill changing the term of enlistment from three to five years, making it more difficult to secure enlistments at a time when it was almost impossible to keep the strength of the Army up to its requirements. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], during the discussion of that amendment, pointed out how harmful it would be to change this policy, and how it would weaken the Army and tend to lessen voluntary enlistments in it. On that motion not a single Republican voted to weaken the Army and destroy its efficiency, but 147 Democrats voted that way. One hundred and twenty-four Republicans and only nine Democrats stood for preparedness and voted against the Hay amendment. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 3, p. 2144.)

That bill also contained a provision known as section 3, reading as follows:

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws authorizing increase of the pay of commissioned officers and enlisted men of the Army serving beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union and the Territories of the United States contiguous thereto, are hereby repealed to the extent to which such increase of pay is authorized by such laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GOOD. The law provided for additional compensation for foreign service. This bill, reported by a Democratic Congress, containing section 3, would prevent paying additional compensation for military service rendered by our boys abroad. How did our Democratic preparedness friends vote on that issue that touched the pocketbook of every man who is following our flag that now waves along the Hindenburg line?

Mr. Prince moved to recommit the bill with instructions to report it back with an amendment striking out this objectionable section 3. On that vote 115 Republicans and only 2 lone Democrats voted to strike out this un-American provision. Not a single Republican voted against this motion and against giving our boys extra pay for foreign service, but 162 Democrats voted that way. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 3, p. 2145.)

The Democratic opposition to Gen. Leonard A. Wood, one of the greatest military commanders in the world, but who, like Col. Theodore Roosevelt, is not permitted to perform any great service in this war, antedates our entrance into the war with Germany. At the second session of the Sixty-second Congress the Army appropriation bill contained a provision which, if enacted into law, would have removed Gen. Leonard A. Wood as Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States. Only 7 Republicans, but 113 Democrats, voted to destroy the usefulness of Gen. Wood. Opposing that motion there were 81 Republicans and but 11 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 8, p. 8108.)

The only vote on the Army bill where the Democrats rallied and voted for what was claimed by them to be a preparedness measure was on a joint resolution creating a commission to investigate and report as to the advisability of establishing permanent maneuvering grounds, camps of inspection, rifle and artillery ranges for troops of the United States at or near the city of Anniston, Ala. One hundred and fifty-three Democrats voted for that; it contained a juicy piece of pork for Alabama. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 48, pt. 3, p. 2326.)

Six months after the outbreak of the European war Maj. Gardner, of Massachusetts, who has since made the supreme sacrifice in this war, offered a motion to recommit the Army appropriation bill with instructions to increase the appropriation for aeroplanes by $700,000. More than ten times as many Republicans voted for that amendment as there were Democrats supporting it (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 52, pt. 2, p. 2135), and I think now all of us regret that that motion did not prevail. Even the President was opposed to that provision and took the occasion to say to Congress that the time was not propitious for men to become nervous or excited.

In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] offered an amendment to the military bill increasing the Regular Army from 140,000 to 220,000. In favor of this measure of preparedness there were 156 Republicans and only 34 Democrats; opposed to it were 29 Republicans but 184 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 23, 1916.)

In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] offered an amendment to provide for the production of an adequate supply of nitrogen in this country. Everybody knows that we produce very little nitrogen in the United States and are depending largely upon Chile for our supply. The importance of this amendment can not be overestimated as a preparedness measure. And yet the vote upon this very important amendment resulted as follows: For, Republicans 182, Democrats 41; against, Republicans 8, Democrats 171. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 23, 1916.)

Our friend from Oklahoma, Mr. FERRIS, having voted against increasing the efficiency of the militia on three different occasions, having voted to abolish five regiments of Cavalry, and for the Hay amendment changing the term of enlistment from three to five years, thereby weakening the Army, and having voted against the provision granting extra pay to men in the Army for foreign service, and having voted to depose Gen. Leonard A. Wood as Chief of Staff, and for pork to Anniston, Ala., and against increasing our aeroplane service, and against increasing the Army from 140,000 to 220,000, felt it was time to vote right on preparedness, and so he was one of the 41 Democrats who on that occasion voted for preparedness.

In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] offered an amendment to the military bill increasing the Regular Army to 250,000. One hundred and twelve Republicans and only 30 Democrats voted for this measure; 49 Republicans and 172 Democrats voted in opposition thereto. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 8, 1916.)

In the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] offered an amendment striking out of the selective-draft bill the provision for the volunteer system. For Mr. KAHN's amendment there were 169 Republicans and 144 Democrats. As opposed to it there were 42 Republicans and 67 Democrats. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Apr. 28, 1917.)

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] offered a motion to recommit the selective-draft bill with instructions to report it back with the provision giving our great ex-President, Col. Roosevelt, whose patriotism, loyalty, and devotion to his country, and whose great sacrifice in this war no man can question, the right to raise a division and go to France. One hundred and sixty-nine Republicans and but 46 Democrats voted for the Anthony amendment. But 149 Democrats and only 29 Republicans voted against that amendment. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 12, 1917.)

The attitude of the Democratic Party as to pay of soldiers is interesting and illustrative, for when that bill came back I offered an amendment to again recommit the bill to conference with instructions to report it back with an amendment increasing the base pay for our enlisted men to $30 per month. One hundred and fifty-six Republicans voted to increase the pay of our soldiers and only 43 Democrats voted for that increase; 141 Democrats and 37 Republicans voted against increasing their pay. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 16, 1917.)

If the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will search his record, he will find that he was one of the 141 Democrats who voted against paying American soldiers who are fighting our battles over in France the paltry sum of $30 per month.

This is the record of the two parties in the House on the question relating to preparedness in the Army. It will be noted that our Democratic friends almost without exception voted against the bills to increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, voted to abolish five regiments of Cavalry, voted to weaken the Army by changing enlistments from three to five years, voted against granting increased pay for overseas duty, voted for a provision which if carried would have removed Gen. Leonard A. Wood as Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States, voted against increasing the appropriations for aeroplanes, voted against increasing the Regular Army from 140,000 to 220,000, voted against the provision to increase our supply of nitrogen, voted against the provision to permit Roosevelt to raise a division for service in France, voted against increasing the base pay of the enlisted men to $30 per month. If there was any opportunity given Democrats to vote for provisions that would have tended to weaken the Army or destroy the usefulness thereof that they did not embrace I have failed to discover it in the record. They apparently welcomed every opportunity to vote against preparedness in the Army and to vote for those little things calculated to destroy the efficiency of this great arm of our country's defense.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GOOD. Just for a brief question.

Mr. BLACKMON. How did the gentleman vote on all of these roll calls?

Mr. GOOD. That is a fair question. I made the mistake of my life following that side of the House [applause on the Democratic side] on one or two roll calls. I voted right on all of them but one or two, and when I voted wrong I followed you. But when I was voting wrong my party was voting right. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Not now. This is the record this House has made on the subject of preparedness. The votes cast on these occasions are history now, and by that history the attitude of the two great political parties as represented in this body can be judged. I submit it, confidently believing that that record will stand the most critical analysis.

Has it occurred to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] that having voted with his party against all preparedness measures during the Roosevelt and Taft administrations, and having voted to reduce appropriations for the Army and for the Navy during their administrations, under the ordinary rules of the game he and his party would be estopped from now claiming that the appropriations made during those times were too small?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. GOOD. It is not a pleasant duty for me to make this comparison, but no one on this side of the aisle has raised the issue. The issue has been raised by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], chairman of the Democratic congressional committee. That issue has been raised for partisan purposes and there is but one way to meet that issue, and that is to fairly and honorably compare the record of the votes of the two parties upon these great measures. This terrible record against all preparedness which our Democratic friends in Congress have made has evidently driven them to desperation. At a time of all times when politics should be adjourned we find them playing the game to the extent of making unfair and incorrect comparisons and giving wrong impressions as to the attitude of the two political parties on this very important subject, and in order to detract attention from their own shortcomings, at the opening of a congressional campaign when true Americans are thinking only of country and not of party, they seize the flag and appropriate it as their campaign banner.

We are proud of the achievements of our boys in France, and with the gentleman from Oklahoma we rejoice in the great achievements of our Navy. But we can not help wondering what the record of that Navy would be now if the gentleman from Oklahoma and his party had had their way and had prevented, as they tried during Republican administrations, the building up of a strong American Navy, which is to-day the pride, the protection, and the comfort of all America.

The splendid record of the Republicans in Congress before we entered the war has been sustained since war with Germany was declared. Upon the patriotic record made by my party in Congress since we entered the war, I call upon that great Democrat, the man responsible for the nomination of Woodrow Wilson, Col. George Harvey, editor of the North American Review, to bear testimony. In the July, 1918, number of the North American Review, he says:

> Upon all of the war propositions combined the Republican vote in the Senate has been 76 per cent plus against 75 per cent minus Democratic, while in the House 169 Republicans voted for and 42 against the President's selective-draft measure, as contrasted with 144 Democratic ayes and 67 Democratic noes, and later 164 Republicans voted for and only 14 against the essential modification urged by the President, as contrasted with 79 Democratic ayes and 118 Democratic noes.
> Clearly no fair mind can fail to give to the Republicans of Congress a clean bill of patriotism in upholding the President to the full and in putting aside all partisan considerations.

[Applause on Republican side.]

The issues to be determined at the polls in November are relatively of but little consequence, except as they relate to the all-consuming, overpowering question of winning the war, and winning it now. When Congress passed the resolution declaring war against the Imperial Government of Germany and pledged all the resources of the Nation, both in men and in money for the prosecution of that war, its action had a peculiar significance to every patriot in or out of Congress. Since the passage of that declaration Republicans have made every question subordinate to the one great central accomplishment, that of winning the war, and success or failure in the coming election will not in the future deter Republicans from a vigorous prosecution of the war. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, there appeared in morning papers a letter written by Mr. Tumulty, Secretary to President Wilson, to Mr. Will H. Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee. That letter has been telegraphed all over the country and appears quite generally to-day in the public press. To-day Mr. Hays made reply to that letter, which so well states the position of all Republicans in this campaign that I shall read it to the House. Mr. Hays's reply to the letter of Mr. Tumulty is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 12, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH P. TUMULTY,
White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TUMULTY: I have your telegram. On September 2 in Chicago I attended a meeting of the Association of Republican State Chairman, called by its president and attended by 15 of such chairmen. At that meeting I made remarks referring in a general way to the lengths to which the Democratic leaders are going in their efforts to control the Senate and House, and also as to the irrevocable stand of the Republican Party for a vigorous prosecution of the war and against an inconclusive peace.

I did not use the words quoted in your telegram. What I said then, which I now reaffirm and which I shall continue to declare, was substantially as follows:

DENOUNCING DEMOCRATIC EFFORTS TO USE THE WAR FOR PARTISAN PURPOSES.

First, as to the means resorted to by certain Democratic leaders to get votes, I said:

"In the special election in Wisconsin the Democratic machine leaders published advertisements, undenied since by them, addressed to the soldiers at Camp Grant, as follows:

"'To the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant:

"'Tuesday, April 2, you are entitled to vote for United States Senator from Wisconsin to succeed Senator Paul O. Husting.

"'President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for Joseph E. Davies for United States Senator.

"'Davies's election means joy at Washington and gloom at Berlin.

"'Davies's defeat means gloom at Washington and joy at Berlin.'"

I regard this as an infamous prostitution of all patriotic proprieties and the grossest violation of the plainest civil duty, worthy of the severest condemnation of all Americans. In this crisis, when all patriots are striving to bring to the aid of the country's cause every resource in men and material, when thousands of Republican and Democratic boys are dying, side by side, and when both political parties are loyal, such conduct is immeasurably reprehensible. From such actions it is evident, and I regret to say it, that these Democratic leaders will go to any lengths to carry the Senate and House. Such unpatriotic efforts to use the war for partisan purposes must fail. Such inevitable failure was indicated by the Wisconsin result, it was further shown in the Michigan primary, and it will be conclusively proven in the Maine election next week. The American people will not tolerate it.

PROCLAIMING PRINCIPLES OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN THE WAR.

This is the war of no political party. This is the people's war, and we demand that the war be kept out of partisan politics and that partisanship be kept out of the war. And what we ask from the party in power we irrevocably pledge for ourselves.

Second, as to the imperative necessity of a vigorous prosecution of the war and a conclusive peace only, and the need of a Republican Congress to that end, in connection with a discussion of the candidacy of Mr. Ford in the Republican primary in Michigan and his statement as to why he became a candidate, and while reviewing the service Republicans in Congress rendered the major war measures which were opposed by the Democratic leaders, Chairman DENT, of the Military Affairs Committee, floor leader KITCHIN, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and others, I said:

AVOWING THE MOST VIGOROUS PROSECUTION OF THE WAR AND A PEACE WITH VICTORY.

"We demand the most vigorous prosecution of the war and a peace with victory. A Republican Congress means a war Congress, and we pledge our candidates to be men who are supremely pro-American, who will give the country's all for the winning of the war now, and who will stand irrevocably against any peace based on a compromise of principles which would violate American rights, interests, and honor and make of our sacrifice a sacrilege to be made again by our grandchildren. I hope and trust the Democratic Party will work by the same token."

Recognizing as we all do that there will always be politics, I am pleased to advise you what I said to these Republican State chairmen, because I insist that our politics be open and acknowledged and on a plane and of a character that needs no subterfuge, and that there be no political partisanship in anything that touches the war.

ASSERTING THAT A REPUBLICAN CONGRESS MEANS A WAR CONGRESS SUPREMELY PRO-AMERICAN.

Further, I now take the opportunity to appeal to you directly, and to the Democratic organization, as I long ago did in my reply to Col. George Harvey's letter, to join with us in this effort to keep partisanship out of the war and the war out of partisan politics. This is no time for little things. The world is on fire. Our duty to our soldiers, measured by their marvelous accomplishments and their supreme service, the magnitude of the task ahead for us all, and the incalculable consequence of the result all cry out for the fullest cooperation. Let not political parties spend their time accusing each other of disloyalty when both are loyal.

I urge that there be no accusation of disloyalty from either one side or the other in this campaign. Such accusations will give a totally false impression to the enemy, and the party or the committee making such accusations will be guilty in that very act of the worst kind of disloyalty.

We have a heavy load to haul. Let us, as far as possible, hitch up both our great political horses and have them both used, unhampered, freely to pull this load, each striving to see which can pull the harder.

Sincerely, yours,

(Signed) W. H. HAYS.

APPENDIX.

[From the Washington Star, January 30, 1912.]

WARSHIPS CUT OFF—DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS PUTS BAN ON NAVAL INCREASE—MAY BE FATAL MISTAKE—BY VOTE OF 98 TO 68 IT LOSES CHANCE AT THIS SESSION—NO NEW PUBLIC BUILDINGS—FITZGERALD RESOLUTION GOES THROUGH AND NOW TALK OF RESCINDING THE ACTION IS HEARD.

In the cold gray dawn of the morning after the Democrats of the House, who in caucus last night put the ban on public building and battleship appropriations at this session of Congress, are wondering if they haven't made a fatal political mistake. The assault on the naval increase was by way of an afterthought.

After the caucus had been in session a couple of hours it became apparent that the resolution introduced by Chairman Fitzgerald, of the Appropriations Committee, declaring it to be the sense of the caucus that the present state of the Government's finances and the fact that the Supervising Architect's Office is several years behind in its work made it inadvisable to authorize additional public buildings at this session.

In retaliation the public-buildings advocates, angered by seeing the pork barrel rolled out of sight just when they were hoping for a grand distribution, insisted on a declaration against battleships. Speaker CLARK, Majority Leader UNDERWOOD, Mr. Fitzgerald, and their friends fell into line and both propositions went through. Representative BURNETT, of Alabama, a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, offered the battleship amendment to the Fitzgerald resolution, which, on roll call, went through, 98 to 68.

Although a new caucus rule adopted just a few weeks ago provides that such record votes in caucus shall be published, a good many of the Democrats were very averse last night to making the economy roll call public. But Mr. UNDERWOOD read the caucus rule and lifted the lid. Following are the Democrats who voted to effect a saving of approximately $40,000,000 at this session, at the expense of Federal structures and warships:

Those who voted for saving:

Adair	Ferguson	Koenig	Russell
Adamson	Fitzgerald	Korbly	Sabath
Anderson	Flood, Va.	Lamb	Saunders
Beall	Foster, Ill.	Levy	Shackelford
Boehne	Garner	Linthicum	Sheppard
Buchanan	Garrett	Lloyd	Sherley
Burgess	Goeke	Lobeck	Sherwood
Burleson	Goldfogle	McCoy	Sisson
Burnett	Gray	Morrison	Slayden
Calloway	Gregg, Pa.	Moss	Stanley
Clark, Mo.	Gregg, Tex.	Oldfield	Stephens, Miss.
Clayton	Hardin	Page	Stephens, Nebr.
Collier	Hardwick	Palmer	Stephens, Tex.
Conry	Hay	Patten, N. Y.	Stone
Covington	Heflin	Pepper	Sulzer
Cullop	Helm	Peters	Taylor, Ala.
Davis, W. Va.	Henry, Tex.	Rainey	Taylor, Ohio
Denver	Hensley	Raker	Thayer
Dickinson, Mo.	Hughes, N. H.	Rauch	Tuttle
Dies	Hull	Riley	Underwood
Dixon, Ind.	Humphreys	Richardson	Whitacre
Doremus	James	Riordan	White
Driscol, D. A.	Johnson, S. C.	Rubey	Witherspoon
Evans	Kitchin	Rucker	Young, Tex.

Those Members who resisted the economy policy of the leaders were:

Aiken	Daugherty	Holland	Post
Alexander	Ellerbe	Hughes, Ga.	Pou
Ashbrook	Faison	Jacoway	Roddenberry
Ayres	Ferris	Jones	Rucker, Colo.
Bathrick	Finley	Lee, Ga.	Shay
Bell	Floyd, Ark.	Lee, Pa.	Smith, N. Y.
Borland	Fowler	Legare	Talcott
Brantley	Francis	Lever	Townsend
Bulkley	Gallagher	Littlepage	Tribble
Burke, Wis.	Glass	Littleton	Turnbull
Byrnes, S. C.	Godwin, N. C.	Macon	Underhill
Byrns, Tenn.	Goodwin, Ark.	Martin, Colo.	Watkins
Carlin	Gudger	Mays	Webb
Carter	Hamill	Moore, Tex.	Wickliffe
Clark, Fla.	Harrison, Miss.	Murray	Wilson, N. Y.
Cravens	Hobson	O'Shaunessy	Wilson, Pa.

During the progress of the caucus last night Representative FRANK CLARK of Florida emerged from the Hall of the House wearing an expression of profound disgust. Mr. CLARK, it might be mentioned, is one of the most independent Members of the House, without regard to politics, who ever stepped in shoe leather. He thinks freely and says what he thinks in a loud, positive tone.

CALLS THEM "PEANUT ECONOMISTS."

"These peanut economists make me weary," he remarked last night. "Of course we can save if we don't spend it when necessary. I might have become wealthy by this time if I hadn't bought food and clothes when necessary, but instead had permitted my family and myself to go hungry and ragged. I don't believe the people of the country want to see money saved in this way."

Representative MCDERMOTT, of the stockyards district of Chicago, also had a comment to make.

"We've been out in the cold for 16 years," he said, "looking enviously through the windows, and now when we get inside the house we find there isn't anything to eat."

Representative Hobson, of Alabama, announced to-day that he would immediately begin circulating a petition for a special caucus on the battleship proposition and make a determined effort to have the action of last night's caucus in this regard rescinded. The public buildings advocates say they will not agree to this unless they are taken care of.

"No public buildings, no battleships," is their ultimatum.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request. I addressed the House this morning, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I do not want to object to the gentleman from Alabama extending his remarks—I desire to say that I shall do so unless the gentleman from Alabama will state that he will not continue his remarks in regard to a member of another legislative body, to which I objected this morning.

Mr. HEFLIN. No further than I did in my remarks after the gentleman made the point.

Mr. DENISON. Very well, I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall be brief. I just want to pay my compliments to the Republican and Democratic statesmen who, instead of discussing the all-important revenue bill, have taken up the afternoon with political harangues. I can just imagine the soldier in the trenches reading of the cheap, vulgar, partisan nonsense with which we have been regaled here this afternoon. [Laughter and applause.] It is sickening. Each party has appealed to the necessity of having a united Nation, and then has proceeded to show that the other party was absolutely worthless; that it could not be trusted in time of peace and could be trusted less in time of war. I am in accord with the Republicans when they show the worthlessness of the Democrats [applause on the Democratic side] and I am in accord with the Democrats when they prove that the Republicans do not deserve the confidence of the masses.

The last speaker accused the Democrats of hypocrisy. Far be it from me to undertake the impossible task of defending the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] They accuse the Democrats of hypocrisy in coming out in 1916 with the slogan, "He kept us out of war," and then proceeding to declare war. To this I must say that two congressional campaigns have occurred since the conflagration in Europe started in 1914 and I did not hear any Republican in 1914 nor in 1916 come before the American people on a platform that the American people should constitute itself the avenger of Belgium, and still the Republicans have voted for war and now claim to be the real war party. I did not hear any Republicans come before us between 1914 and 1917 with a definite constructive international program, and they have no program now. They do not know now where in the world they are at. The only suggestion they make now is that we declare war on Bulgaria and Turkey. Then, they say, will the world be safe.

They also present the slogan, "Win the war and win it now." What does it mean, "win it now"? Is it not a hypocritical suggestion that if you Republicans get into power you will settle the war at once? Is that what it means? You do not dare to mention the word "peace," but say, "Win the war and win it now." Win it now? That is mere camouflage. You are all politicians, trying to catch votes, trying to get control of the next House, and that is all there is to it—a cheap political game on both sides. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. What would you do, declare peace?

Mr. LONDON. I will tell you what I would do.

Mr. NORTON. Disband the Army and the Navy?

Mr. LONDON. I will answer you, sir. I wish I could reach with my voice the people and I would be able to convince them that the salvation of the world depends upon the adoption of the philosophy of the Socialist movement, and I would be able to convince them——

Mr. NORTON. On the St. Louis platform, adopt that?

Mr. LONDON. Just listen to me. I would be able to convince them that if we had a majority of Socialists in England and in France and in the United States and in Germany that the war would be over to-morrow; I would be able to convince them that the only men in the German Reichstag who opposed the submarine war against the United States were the German Socialists, and that it was the Socialists who were everywhere seeking to eliminate the causes that led to war.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. No; let me develop my argument. I would be able to convince them that there is no solution except in the adoption of the principles of the international league of nations which the Socialists have been advocating. As the Socialist Member of Congress I presented a consistent and intelligent solution of the international evil from which the world suffered and suffers now when, on December 6, 1915, I introduced a resolution demanding that Belgium be evacuated; that the Germans withdraw from all invaded territory; that the rights of the smaller nationalities be respected, and that an international court of arbitration be established. The spirit and purport of that resolution were approved by the press of the allied countries.

There was presented an honest international policy which has since become the slogan of statesmen. Statesmen are compelled to adopt our philosophy as their slogan, and the liberal movements of the world, the genuine democratic movements in all countries, will compel the statesmen to make these slogans living realities. They shall not remain mere catchwords.

When Republicans talk about preparedness as an issue to-day, how silly! When they charge against some Democrats that they have failed in the past to vote for large navies and large armies, for preparedness, what a stupid slogan to catch fools with it is. The word "preparedness" has no meaning unless you know the purpose of the preparedness. You prepare for a certain purpose.

If I were preparing to follow the career of a minister, I would study theology; if I were preparing to be a pugilist, I would develop myself physically. Preparedness should be measured by the policy of the country. It was not the policy of the United States to prepare for a war with any country. On the contrary, it was our policy by actual practice to convince the world that we had no designs upon any other nation, that no one had any reason to fear us, and that we feared none. The maintenance of a nominal army was consistent with our policy at that time.

When some of those noisy organizations which assume a superior wisdom and a supreme patriotism ask to-day, "Are you in favor of preparedness after the war?" they confess that the slogan of the statesmen of the world that this is the last war is a fraud, because this war will have been an overwhelming disaster, a nightmare without relief, unless it ends in an international agreement among nations for disarmament. [Applause.] And when we speak of preparedness let it be preparedness by developing strong men, by developing technical education, by improving opportunities for education for the masses, and improving conditions in factories and in mines; prepare by developing strong and able men—strong physically, intellectually, and morally; prepare by eliminating the profiteer; prepare by developing political democracy and industrial democracy, making it genuine and real. That is the kind of a preparation I stand for and have always stood for.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman speaks of an international league of nations to secure peace. Would the gentleman join with Germany in that kind of a league and make a peace at this time, and have this Nation unprepared, and expect a continuance of peace?

Mr. LONDON. That takes me away from the subject which I intended to discuss, because, after giving you a drubbing, I intended to talk about the bill.

Mr. NORTON. You need not be particular about any drubbing you may give me. Do not let that worry you.

Mr. LONDON. I am after your party, not after you personally. As to Germany, I would not deal with Germany at all until Germany announces her readiness to evacuate every piece of territory she has taken during the war. [Applause.] I would not talk peace with Germany unless Germany announces her readiness to tear up the infamous Brest-Litovsk treaty. [Applause.] When Germany will have announced her readiness to do that, as a preliminary to entering into a peace conference, when the basic principles upon which a durable peace can be made will have been admitted, then the question of the permanent securing of the peace arrangement by the formation of a permanent league to secure peace must be taken up. In other words——

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. In just one moment. The gentleman asked me a very serious question.

Mr. NORTON. I want to let the gentleman finish. I want to be fair with the gentleman, if the gentleman will be fair with me.

Mr. LONDON. We are not fighting the German people. We do not want to destroy the German people. That is all nonsense. In the excitement and noise and hypnotism of war many talk about the German people as "Huns." That is all nonsense. If the gentleman had been fortunate enough to attend the University of Heidelberg before the war he would have been quite proud of it. We should talk sense. We do not want to see the German people destroyed. We have no enmity toward them. We are at war with them, because our rights have been invaded, and we have found it necessary to be at war with their State, and their State commands the people. That is the situation.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. One moment. Now, an international league must ultimately take in Germany and Austria. Because, if it were not to take them in, it would simply mean that there would be an alliance against an alliance. There would be an alliance of the central powers as against the other alliance of powers. When you speak of an international league to secure peace you necessarily embrace the whole world. That is as clear as day. You necessarily embrace Germany and every other country.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. I take it that actions speak louder than words.

Mr. LONDON. Well, will the gentleman ask me a question?

Mr. NORTON. Yes. Does the gentleman think that Germany can be brought to evacuating Belgium and tearing up the Brest-Litovsk treaty by such actions and such resolution as were passed by the Socialist Party at St. Louis, and by such votes as the gentleman has recorded on the war question in this House? [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Oh, my dear sir, so far as the vote is concerned, the gentleman should not forget this: A man has a right, every democrat—using the word "democrat" in the wide sense—has the right——

Mr. NORTON. Was the gentleman opposed to our entering into the war against Germany?

Mr. LONDON. Of course; I voted against it.

Mr. NORTON. Did you expect to defeat Germany by talking about that?

Mr. LONDON. I do not care to go into a discussion of the reasons for my vote. I had very good reasons which appealed to me, and I am not inclined to apologize for my vote. The gentleman asked if I had voted against war. Of course I did. If the gentleman had carefully read my speeches which I delivered in the Sixty-fourth Congress he would have learned something, and he would have learned the reasons for my vote.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. In one moment. In a democracy you must permit men to express an opinion. I, as a Socialist, advise to obey the law. Only then, when I have been given an opportunity by voice and vote to oppose the enactment of a law with which I disagree, only when I have been given an opportunity to oppose a law with which I disagree by voice and vote, can I come with a free and honest conscience and say, "Obey that law. It is the law of democracy. It is the law of majority rule. I have not been suppressed by a vulgarian, I have not been suppressed by an ignoramus, because I happened to differ with him. I have been given a chance to speak my mind and vote my convictions. The others are in the majority. We are in a minority. We are members of a great Republic. Obey the will of the majority as expressed in a constitutional way." Will any manly man criticize me for having spoken my mind and having voiced the opinions of those who have sent me here? The man who would deny to me this right and this privilege would suppress every principle upon which a sound democracy is based. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I just want to ask the gentleman this question: Does he or does he not approve the platform declaration of his party at St. Louis that declared this war to be "a capitalistic war"?

Mr. LONDON. Well, let me say this: The platform of the Socialist Party adopted at St. Louis was drafted under very peculiar and extraordinary circumstances. The convention was called to meet, I believe, in April—April 8 or 10. As the gentleman will recall, the President called the special session of Congress for April 15; originally for April 15. The Socialists, who were opposed to the entry of the United States into the war, called a convention for the purpose of adopting resolutions protesting against the contemplated declaration of war, resolutions which they undoubtedly had the right to promulgate; resolutions which were being adopted by thousands and hundreds of thousands of Republicans and Democrats. After the convention had been called, but before the convention met, the President advanced the date of the special session of Congress, and when they did meet they found themselves with Congress in special session.

This resolution of the St. Louis convention was a protest, an outcry. It offered no workable program of action, and there immediately began a division of opinion.

I have always taken this stand on war: I am in duty bound to oppose the entry of my country into war, not because I do not love but because I do love my country. I am for the United States. I am ashamed of cheap professions of patriotism. I am proud of the achievements of America, of her glorious past, and of the promise for the future that she holds out to the world. It is all foolishness, this constant proclaiming of one's love of country. [Applause.] It is taken for granted by all intelligent men. [Applause.] After war is declared, then my obligation assumes this character. Let the gentleman from Texas listen and he will agree with me.

Mr. BLACK. It seems to me that the gentleman is not answering the question whether he does or does not agree with the St. Louis platform.

Mr. LONDON. I said that the platform was not a platform in any sense of the word. It was not constructive; it did not offer a method or a policy for the party. I so declared at the earliest opportunity I had.

After war is declared my theory is this, particularly in a republic: A greater evil than a foreign war is a civil war. In a republic the majority having decided for war, that will must be carried out. I can only permit myself to present my ideas of international peace in a manner which will not obstruct the carrying on of the war, which will not give encouragement to the enemy, which will not create dissension. I must content myself during war, in order to keep the ideal alive, to analyzing the historical causes which led nations into war and to point out the basic principles upon which a lasting peace can be obtained when the war is concluded. That has been my rule. I have contented myself with that modest way of keeping alive my ideas—of sticking by my higher religion, the religion of humanity.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I listened to the gentleman's speech made in opposition to the declaration of war; and if I am not correct in what I am about to say, it is because my memory does not serve me. My recollection is that the gentleman tried to point out to the House that capital was doing a great deal to bring the war on, and that it was a war brought on by the capitalists.

Mr. LONDON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, anybody who does not understand that most wars are caused by the conflict of economic interests of nations, by rivalry for markets and spheres of influence and spheres of interests, does not understand history.

If the gentleman needs a good authority, I will refer him to the Encyclopedia Britannica. Let him read the article on Europe and European history where the rivalries between European nations for the possession of new markets are described, and he will find that the contest among nations for the extension of their economic and commercial power is one of the principal reasons for war.

Let me say that one of the reasons why the allies will defeat Germany is just this, that the economic isolation of Germany has been accomplished. Fifty-eight per cent of the raw materials which went into the manufacture of German products were being imported prior to the war, and because Germany is isolated from the rest of the world it is only a question of time when she will be compelled to yield. [Applause.] The economic phase should not be overlooked. Whenever the Socialist speaks of the economic causes of war he speaks of an historical fact. I have been trying to make it clear that the United States, as a participant of the war, has no selfish designs.

I recall an amusing incident when the President said in the course of a certain speech that we had no definite grievance, or something to that effect.

Some Democrats were scared to death. What! Declare war without any definite economic or material object to be accomplished? Do not we want to grab a piece of land and bring it to the people of the United States? Do we not want to get an additional colony and say, "Here, boys, you have shed your blood and here is a bit of territory for you?" They were scared to death. They did not see the spiritual significance of the influence of the United States when fighting for no selfish purpose. They did not understand it or realize it.

In a way—and I have to praise myself, for you gentlemen will not do it—I have been the interpreter of the President's high international ideals on the floor of this Congress and outside of this body.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Being quite in accord with the view of the gentleman that, having isolated Germany commercially, the war is won——

Mr. LONDON. No doubt.

Mr. FOCHT. Let me ask the gentleman this question. He speaks of a council of international peace.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. What is the gentleman's conception of the attitude of this country under the jurisdiction of such a council? Are we to surrender our prerogatives and the power that we have exercised under the Monroe Doctrine to that council for the adjustment of affairs in South and Central America, or are we to retain them? What is the gentleman's view about that?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman has asked me that question. Let us be clear about it. The gentleman will remember the State-rights idea, and how it all began to disappear. The gentlemen saw the anomaly of the Democratic Party federalizing the State Militia. The Democrats could not help it. State rights had to be curtailed when the Union became indissoluble. It is impossible to conceive an international league to secure peace without a code of ethics which should be superior to the individual national code. There can be no international code with each nation insisting that it can do as it pleases whenever it pleases. In other words, international order involves the loss, to some extent, of what nations claim now as absolute sovereign rights, just as the individual has surrendered his sovereign rights as an individual in order to live as a member of the community. I would like to have lived and talked and dreamed in my own way, but I have to live in accordance with customs and laws, and sometimes customs are even superior in their coercive power to laws. Once there is an agreement of that sort, that certain rules are to be sanctioned by international law, nations will have to subordinate their selfish national designs. What is the complaint against Germany? The complaint against Germany is that the German says to-day, "Germany, right or wrong." If every nation is to insist that whatever it desires is right and that the opinion of the world is not to be consulted, there can, of course, be no lasting or any other kind of peace among nations.

We must learn to measure our conception of right by that which prevails among our neighbors for whom we have respect. There must be an international code of morality, an international code of right, worked out not only by a few very clever statesmen who will come together and draft a clever plan for an international league; no. It must grow with the growth of intelligence among the masses of the people, and that is why I consider it so wrong for anybody to prohibit the discussion of international questions. We want to educate the great masses of the people. Among the European people there has been a great deal of education on this question. The Socialist movement throughout the world demands the organization at the conclusion of the war of an international league to secure peace. That is why that movement has grown all over the world. Unfortunately we here are too much victims of the idea that even Members of Congress must not discuss international relations, but that it should be done a couple of blocks away. Now, if the gentleman will yield me 10 minutes I will come to the thing about which I want to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. LONDON. This has been a diversion. I want to address myself to the subject of the revenue bill. When you speak of a revenue bill of $8,000,000,000 it is not a tax bill in any sense of the word. Its magnitude changes the character of the legislation. Taxes are collected for the ordinary purposes of the Government to carry out the governmental functions of a civilized community. When you speak of $8,000,000,000 you impose a burden of $400 for every family of five annually, nearly one-half of the average earnings of the average family engaged in industrial occupation; when you speak of that as taxes you abuse an economic term.

This is a great, heavy burden; a burden made necessary by the exigency of war. What is the statesmen's problem? It is not so much to search through the dictionary for names of articles on which you can impose taxes. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts has discovered that bicycles have not been taxed, and somebody else has discovered that toothpicks have not been taxed. There may be some articles which have escaped the tax gatherer.

The task of the men who are responsible for the guidance of the destiny of the Nation to-day is how to increase the productivity of the people. What does the individual do when in distress, when a new burden is imposed upon him? His first impulse is to economize. Next he tries to increase his earning capacity, his productivity. A nation can not economize in the sense in which an individual can practice thrift. If every member of the community is to stop buying, there will be no sellers, no industrial or commercial life; all will be stagnation, and we will have a general crisis.

A nation can economize only in the sense that nonessential industries must yield to essential industries.

The great problem is how to increase the productivity of the Nation, and it is to this that statesmen must address themselves. The burden will become heavier and heavier even if the war should end in a few months. It is bound to become heavier because of the obligations we have assumed toward the soldiers and their families. Casualties are bound to be heavy, because the American soldier is not going to be restrained by any rules of caution which are born of four years' experience. The impetuous, brave, fearless, and almost reckless American will risk his life more freely than any other soldier, and casualties are bound to be heavy. There is no question about that. Now, this assumed heavy burden must be provided for. The interest on the national debt will probably amount to as much as the entire budget of the Government required before the war.

The unprecedented burden, with its new and heavy responsibilities, requires new thoughts, demands new methods.

We must begin to preserve, conserve, and enlarge all our national resources.

The beginning must be made with the human material, the most valuable asset. Thirty-six out of every hundred men examined for military service have been found to be physically defective. Some of these are taken to the camps, it is true, and an effort is made to fix them up, but the success is rather limited. Just think of the economic waste to the Nation involved in the fact that 36 out of every 100 are physically defective. The census of 1910 gives the number of illiterates in the United States at 5,516,163, with the native born (negro and white, inclusive) in the majority. A sinful waste of human material. We have neglected technical education. When the country was young and opportunity was unlimited all was left to the individual, who had concern for himself only.

Industrial accidents, insanitary conditions in factory and mine, 600,000 premature deaths annually from preventable diseases, the stunting of the child's growth by child labor—what a tremendous loss in the production power of the Nation all these things involve!

We have not utilized more than one-fourth of the land. Large tracts lie idle and are held for speculation. The majority of the farmers are handicapped by inadequate agricultural implements. This deserves our thought.

Take water power. We are wasting a tremendous power, a power which can not be consumed in use. This indestructible power is going to waste. We have a proposition before Congress to conserve water power. How? To have all sorts of individual capitalists exploit the people and to give to these individuals the control over the natural resources of the country.

The coal lands, the oil lands, the mineral lands in private hands—did you ever stop to think how much waste that involves to the Nation, to the people collectively?

There is now a proposition before Congress to encourage the production of minor minerals by aiding and encouraging, at public expense, private individuals in mining enterprises, and not—Heaven forbid—by the people undertaking the task for the permanent benefit of the people.

We are now constructing, at public expense, a merchant marine. Where was private capital? Private capital was seeking the accomplishment of private ends, and when it found foreign ships cheaper it used the cheaper article. It never stopped to consider the interests of the Nation.

Everybody rails against profiteering. Is not all business based upon profiteering? Men are in business for profit. I think it was a Democratic Representative from Texas who said, in replying to the Republican charge that not everything was just right at Hog Island, that the profiteers were Republicans. I can imagine that the profiteers were largely Republicans, because they have a larger number of well-to-do people, grand larceny being the Republican province and petit larceny the Democratic sphere. [Laughter.] Now, profiteering can only be eliminated in proportion to the growth of the principle of industrial democracy, in proportion to the application of the theory that in industrial relations there should prevail the same principle of democracy which you Democrats claim to hold sacred in politics, and which you Republicans claim to have inherited from Lincoln.

The worst about profiteering is that it is the most prolific source of waste. Tens of thousands of establishments inadequately equipped, with insufficient capital, competing with one another, crossing and recrossing the same territory with hosts of expensive salesmen and advertising agents; what a waste of energy, what a loss of productivity, what a throwing away of resources all this implies.

Unrestrained individualism in industry is bankrupt. The Nation must undertake to guide industry along lines which will eliminate the waste of useless competition and do away with the profiteer. We must introduce a larger application of the idea of industrial democracy in the life of nations. We must get rid of the army of grafting middlemen, who stand between the farmer and the consumer, between the producer and the consumer.

Take the railroads. Why, you Democrats are charged by the Republicans with being Socialists, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] resents it. I do not blame him. He does not know what socialism is, and he resents being called a name which he does not understand. That is perfectly natural. A distinguished Republican says that you Democrats want to keep the railroads. The distinguished Democrat from Alabama says, "No; we do not want to keep them. We want to give them back to the private capitalists. We want those capitalists to establish and maintain a corruption lobby; we want them to control the financial and industrial life of the country; we want them to have it in their power to refuse employment or to give employment to millions of men. We will not interfere with them. Oh, no. Right after the war we will turn the railroads over to the magnates, you know. We are Jeffersonian Democrats and are not supposed to have learned anything since Jefferson's day."

Of course the Democrats, in spite of their democratic instincts, are not Socialists. They do not know enough to be Socialists. They have promised to turn over the railroads to the private owners within 21 months after the termination of the war.

No matter what the Democrats or Republicans may think now, the growing sentiment in favor of national ownership of public utilities will make it impossible to return the railroads to private ownership. It is safe to predict that all national platforms in 1920 will deal with that problem.

The Nation can increase its productive powers tenfold by pooling its resources, by eliminating useless and wasteful competition, and by introducing democracy and cooperation in industry and agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

SUPPLEMENTING SECOND LIBERTY-BOND ACT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I present the unanimous report (H. Rept. No. 778) of the Committee on Ways and Means on House bill 12923, a bill to supplement the second liberty-loan act as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina presents a report from the Committee on Ways and Means. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report on H. R. 12923, a bill to supplement the second liberty-bond act as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves all points of order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short address that I delivered to the soldier boys at Camp Humphreys about a week ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short address delivered by him to the soldier boys at Camp Humphreys recently. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that to-morrow we hope to dispose of the bill which we have introduced to-day, the bill to supplement the second liberty-bond act, and also to close the general debate on the revenue bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to take up for consideration the bill that has just been presented?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it not be advisable to have it printed in the RECORD to-morrow, together with the report, so that Members might have it to study to-morrow morning?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I think it should be. I will have that done.

Mr. WALSH. It will have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill and report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to have the bill and report printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. And the ordinary print ought to be made and be available here to-morrow, because the RECORD is printed in fine type for a partially blind man.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12923 and the report thereon may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill and report referred to are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act as amended, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That until the expiration of two years after the date of the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, fixed by proclamation of the President—

(1) The interest on an amount of bonds of the fourth liberty loan the principal of which does not exceed $30,000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations;

(2) The interest received after January 1, 1918, on an amount of bonds of the first liberty loan converted, dated either November 15, 1917, or May 9, 1918, the second liberty loan, converted and unconverted, and the third liberty loan, the principal of which does not exceed $45,000 in the aggregate, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from such taxes: Provided, however, That no owner of such bonds shall be entitled to such exemption in respect to the interest on an aggregate principal amount of such bonds exceeding one and one-half times the principal amount of bonds of the fourth liberty loan originally subscribed for by such owner and still owned by him at the date of his tax return; and

(3) The interest on an amount of bonds, the principal of which does not exceed $30,000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, issued upon conversion of 3½ per cent bonds of the first liberty loan in the exercise of any privilege arising as a consequence of the issue of bonds of the fourth liberty loan, shall be exempt from such taxes.

The exemptions provided in this section shall be in addition to the exemption provided in section 7 of the second liberty bond act in respect to the interest on an amount of bonds and certificates, authorized by such act and amendments thereto, the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000, and in addition to all other exemptions provided in the second liberty-bond act.

SEC. 2. That section 6 of the second liberty-bond act is hereby amended by striking out the figures "$2,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$4,000,000,000." Such section is further amended by striking out the words "and it shall not be lawful for any one person at any one time to hold war savings certificates to an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and it shall not be lawful for any one person at one time to hold war savings certificates of any one series to an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000."

SEC. 3. That the provisions of section 8 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty-bond act, shall apply to the proceeds arising from the payment of war-profits taxes as well as income and excess-profits taxes.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury may make arrangements in or with foreign countries to stabilize the foreign exchanges and to obtain foreign currencies and credits in such currencies, and he may use any such credits and foreign currencies for the purpose of stabilizing or rectifying the foreign exchanges, and he may designate depositaries in foreign countries with which may be deposited as he may determine all or any part of the avails of any foreign credits or foreign currencies.

SEC. 5. That clause (b) of section 5 of the trading-with-the-enemy act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and he may require any such person engaged in any such transaction to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters or other papers, in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed."

SEC. 6. That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association, actually paid in and unimpaired, and 10 per cent of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, (2) the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm, negotiating the same, and (3) the purchase or discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section; but the total liabilities to any association, of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm, upon any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association and secured by such bonds or certificates of indebtedness, shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association."

SEC. 7. That the short title of this act shall be "Supplement to second liberty-bond act."

[H. Rept. No. 778, 65th Cong., 2d sess.]

Mr. KITCHIN, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act as amended, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, reports it back to the House without amendment and recommends that the bill do pass.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The chief purpose of this legislation is to provide a limited exemption from income surtaxes and war and excess-profits taxes upon income to be derived from the fourth liberty loan bond issue, the flotation of which is to open on September 28, and also to free a larger portion of the income from the first, second, and third liberty loan issues from similar taxation. Your committee believes that this legislation will materially assist in the sale of the next liberty bonds.

THE NEW MEASURE.

INTEREST FROM LIBERTY LOAN BONDS EXEMPT.

Section 1 of the proposed bill provides that interest on fourth liberty loan bonds not in excess of $30,000, owned by any person, partnership, corporation, or association, shall be exempt from surtaxes and excess-profits or war-profits taxes.

This section also provides that the interest from the first, second, and third liberty bonds shall be exempt from surtaxes and excess-profits or war-profits taxes to the extent of one and one-half times the amount of fourth liberty loan bonds subscribed and held upon the date of the tax return by any such taxpayers, but it is provided that such exemption shall not exceed $45,000 of such bonds.

A further provision is added to the effect that if any taxpayer converts first liberty loan bonds by reason of the issuing of the fourth liberty loan bonds, he shall be entitled to similar exemptions to the extent of $30,000 of such bonds. It is provided, however, that in all of the above cases the interest from these bonds shall be only exempt from these taxes until two years after the termination of the present war.

WAR-SAVINGS CERTIFICATES.

The bill provides in section 2 that the amount of war-savings certificates available to be issued shall be increased from $2,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000, and that the amount of war-savings certificates of any one series that may be held by any one person shall not exceed $1,000. In other words, any person may purchase $1,000 of war-savings certificates of the present series and an additional $1,000 for each succeeding series which may be issued.

WAR-PROFITS TAXES TO BE DEPOSITED WITH GOVERNMENT DEPOSITARIES.

Section 3 of this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit with designated Government depositaries the proceeds arising from the payment of war-profits taxes as well as from income or excess profits taxes. The second liberty-loan act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit in depositaries the proceeds from income and excess-profits taxes. As the pending revenue bill provides for a war-profits tax this section becomes necessary.

STABILIZATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Authority is given in section 4 of this bill to the Secretary of the Treasury to make arrangements in or with foreign countries to stabilize foreign exchange. This provision is deemed necessary in order to give the Secretary of the Treasury greater flexibility in Treasury operations with respect to our dealings in foreign countries.

AMENDMENT TO TRADING-WITH-THE-ENEMY ACT.

Section 5 of this bill amends clause (b), section 5, of the trading-with-the-enemy act so as to empower the President to investigate, regulate, and prohibit, by means of license or otherwise, transactions in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States and the hoarding or melting of gold or silver, in addition to the powers already granted the President under such section.

LOANS MADE BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Section 6 of the bill incorporates the provisions of H. R. 10691, entitled "An act to amend section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, as amended," which has already passed the House in this session of Congress. Section 5200 of the Revised Statutes limits the amount of loans which national banks can make to any one borrower to one-tenth of the capital stock and surplus of such banks. The effect of the amendment to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes is to permit any national bank to lend a borrower, in addition to the aforementioned amount, an additional amount not to exceed 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of such bank, in case the borrower discounts with such bank a note or notes secured by not less than a like amount of bonds of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness.

SHORT TITLE OF THIS ACT.

Section 7 provides that the short title of this act shall be "Supplement to second liberty-bond act."

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to this bill is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 5, 1918.

DEAR MR. KITCHIN: In connection with the tax bill now before the Congress, and without awaiting its enactment, I feel constrained to bring to your attention a matter affecting the fourth liberty loan. The delay in the enactment of the tax bill, the fact that the rates of income surtaxes, to which the interest on liberty bonds, except the first liberty loan, is subject, will be higher, and the rate of normal income tax on unearned income will be lower than I had contemplated materially affect the prospects of the fourth liberty loan.

I do not mention these things critically, for I realize that the Ways and Means Committee have labored faithfully and earnestly during the hot summer months in the consideration and preparation of the tax bill. I have already expressed my acceptance of a normal tax of 12 per cent without a differential against unearned incomes, and in principle I am now agreed with the committee that a substantial increase in surtax rates will be necessary in order to produce the indicated revenue.

The market price of liberty bonds, which responded favorably to the suggestion of an increased normal tax, from which the bonds will be exempt by their terms, was depressed by the newspaper reports of a greatly increased surtax, to which the interest on the bonds will be subject. I have been anxious to stabilize the interest rate upon Government bonds, believing that by so doing we should be reducing the cost of the war not only to-day for ourselves but in the future for ourselves and for our brave men who are fighting in France and who will have little or no opportunity to accumulate and invest in liberty bonds, though they must upon their return join the army of taxpayers who must pay this interest. I have sought to avoid the issue of bonds at such a rate and upon such terms as might result ultimately, when the war is won, in the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a relatively small proportion of our population, carrying interest at a high rate and exempt from taxes.

The magnificent patriotism of our people and the fervor and efficiency of the liberty-loan organization have made it possible to place the liberty bonds in the hands of many millions of persons who had never before been investors in securities of any kind. Bonds of the third liberty loan received the widest possible distribution, and I feel that we all owe a duty to the millions of subscribers of small means not merely to pay them a fair rate of interest, which we are doing, but to take such measures as may be necessary to insure to them a market for the bonds at approximately par in case their necessities are such as to force them to realize upon the investment which they have made in the Government's obligations. The bond-purchase fund, which was provided in the third liberty-bond bill, has been very useful in stabilizing the price of liberty bonds, but it has not been, and we could not expect it to be, effective to sustain price against adverse developments, and in the face of the fact that the Government's recurring demands upon the absorptive power of the investment community are in such proportions and of such frequency as to prevent the development of any important buying power in the investment market between liberty-loan campaigns.

I have been much impressed by the success of the plan which has been adopted in Canada for the purpose of maintaining the market value of Canada's victory bonds. A careful study of that plan is being made in the Treasury and by the War Finance Corporation, and I am glad to learn that the bankers of the country have been making a similar study. I am not without hope that some such plan may be made effective in the United States, although conditions here are very different and it will not do to depend too much upon the experience of our neighbor. In any event, it will not do to proceed in this matter abruptly, nor without the creation of an immense organization country wide in its ramifications. To make such a plan effective it would be necessary to put an end to dealings in bonds on the exchanges, and accordingly to substitute an active and adequate market through the banking houses of the United States acting in close cooperation with an instrumentality of the Government, probably the War Finance Corporation. At the same time it would be necessary to put an end to the numerous schemes, many of them actually fraudulent, for inducing inexperienced holders of liberty bonds to exchange them for merchandise or property of less inherent value, though carrying the promise of a higher value or a higher income return. In order that the Treasury may be placed in a position to carry such plans as these into effect, if they should be found expedient, I suggest for your consideration the present enactment of appropriate legislation.

Last year I had the privilege of explaining to you and your colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee very fully the reasons why I advocated making the income from liberty bonds subject to income surtaxes. I still believe that that course was wise and that the arguments advanced in favor of it were sound. It will not do, however, to press any theory, however sound, to an extremity, and it is obvious that as a practical matter we can not keep the interest rate on Government bonds stationary, or substantially so, and continue indefinitely to increase the surtaxes, to which the income from those bonds is subject, without at the same time limiting the market for liberty bonds to those who have little or no surtaxes to pay. Since the bond and tax legislation which was under discussion in the summer of 1917 and which was enacted in the fall of 1917, the interest on liberty bonds has been increased only one-fourth of 1 per cent, whereas the surtax rates now in contemplation would carry an increase in the taxes to which the interest on the bonds is subject, rising above 150 per cent increase in some classes. Surtaxes on incomes from $5,000 to $200,000 would under the new tax bill, on the average, be doubled. In order to give the numerous small holders of liberty bonds the advantage of a market upon which they may sell their bonds, in case of necessity, and also to attract subscriptions from the great number of investors of ample means but not of great wealth, it will be necessary immediately either to increase the interest rate or to neutralize the increased surtaxes by freeing the bonds to a limited extent from such taxes.

I recommend that a portion of the income of these bonds should be free from surtaxes for the period of the war and for a brief interval thereafter. This course would make it possible to meet the exigencies of the present situation and to counterbalance the adverse effect on the market value of liberty bonds of the increased surtax rates, and at the same time would not be open to the very grave objection which exists against any unlimited or permanent exemption, which would deprive the Government of the United States of the power to meet its necessities in the future by supertaxes on incomes derived from liberty bonds. If the surtax rates should be reduced after the war, the interest which is fixed in the bonds would continue. Having, as I believe, in fairness to the patriotic people who will subscribe for the fourth liberty loan, to choose between one of two methods for making the bonds more attractive, neither of which is wholly satisfactory, I am inclined to recommend at this time that the holders of these bonds be given a qualified and limited freedom from surtaxes in respect to their holdings rather than that the interest rate should be increased. I believe that on the whole the wise and expedient thing is to grant a limited exemption calculated to counterbalance the increase in surtax rates now contemplated, and which I believe will be only temporary, rather than to increase the interest rate on liberty bonds for the life of the bonds.

I am influenced in this determination by the fact that it continues necessary to sell liberty bonds in competition with billions of dollars of bonds of the United States, the various States and municipalities, which are wholly exempt from surtaxes, as well as from all forms of taxation, so that the person whose income is subject to surtaxes is apt to make a comparison of the income return from the liberty bonds which he is asked to subscribe for, not with the income return from corporation and other securities such as carry no exemption from taxation, but with the income return from wholly exempt bonds of the United States and the various States and municipalities. Under the existing state of the Constitution and laws, such a comparison can not be avoided. In these circumstances, we must find a middle ground between the sound view which would refuse all exemptions from surtaxes, and the practical necessity of taking into account the fact that such exemptions will in any event be gained, as surtaxes are steadily increased, by shifting funds into governmental, State, and municipal bonds, the income from which is exempt from surtaxes as well as from normal taxes.

In granting such exemption, I think appropriate provision should be made to the end that those who subscribe for bonds of the fourth liberty loan may, to the extent of a specified portion of their holdings, participate in the exemption in respect to bonds of the first liberty loan converted to the second liberty loan converted and unconverted, and the third liberty loan.

Should these views commend themselves to the Congress, I believe that immediate action should be taken so that the status of the bonds of the fourth liberty loan, in respect to taxation, may be promply known. It is, in fact, imperative that this status should be quickly known.

There are certain other matters to which I desire to call the attention of your committee at this time:

The provisions of section 8 of the second liberty-bond act, as amended by the third liberty-bond act, should be extended so as to authorize the Secretary to deposit the proceeds arising from the payment of war-profits taxes with qualified depositary banks and trust companies in the United States in the same manner as the proceeds of income and excess-profits taxes.

The time has come to make provision for the sale of war-savings certificates in 1919. The limit of $1,000 on the amount which may be held by any one person should be made to apply separately to the series which will be issued in 1919, so that one holder may own $1,000 of that series in addition to $1,000 of the series of 1918. At the same time the limit of $2,000,000,000 now imposed on the aggregate amount of the issue should be enlarged, or, better, removed, for the necessary distribution of the war-savings stamps among thousands of post offices and other agencies engaged in making sales over the counter may make the limit very embarrassing long before the cash receipts of the Treasury indicate that the limit is about to be reached.

In the negotiations which I have had and am having with or in foreign countries in the effort to stabilize foreign exchange, I find myself seriously hampered because I am without the freedom of action which is possessed by the finance ministers of European countries. I may only sell bonds or Treasury certificates of indebtedness, which involves often international complications, and may not obtain banking credits nor operate as freely as may be necessary in the effort to stabilize exchange. Notwithstanding these restrictions, the Treasury has been able to make substantial progress in dealing with this difficult problem. I urge upon you, however, the incorporation in the law of the necessary authority to give greater flexibility to the operations of the Treasury in this respect.

I believe it is highly desirable at this time that the President should be empowered to investigate, regulate, or prohibit not only the export or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, but also the hoarding or melting thereof.

Last March I called the attention of the Congress to the importance of amending the provisions of section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, limiting the amount of loans which national banks may make to any one borrower. A bill was reported by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House (H. R. 10691), passed by the House, and reported with amendments by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, but not acted upon by the Senate. The Senate did pass a bill (S. 4099) dealing to a certain extent with the same subject matter, prior to the Senate committee report on the House bill, and on the Senate bill no action has been taken by the House. It is essential that this matter be disposed of before the fourth liberty loan is offered.

By way of suggestion and in order the better to formulate my views for your consideration, I have taken the liberty of preparing a bill which would deal with the various points I have mentioned in this letter. A draft of this bill is inclosed. May I not ask that the Ways and Means Committee give these points its immediate attention, with a view to the enactment of the necessary legislation, if my suggestions commend themselves to the committee, in ample time to become effective before the opening of the fourth liberty loan campaign on September 28. I feel that the success of this loan is deeply involved in this legislation.

Mr. Leffingwell is fully informed of my views concerning these matters and is authorized to speak for me in my absence should the committee desire any further information.

Cordially, yours, W. G. McADOO.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

P. S.—I am sending a copy of this letter and the inclosure to Senator SIMMONS.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 13, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 13, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art all powerful, but Thou art all loving, too. Into Thy hands we come and commit our way. We trust Thee for Thy guidance. We pray Thee that Thou wouldst give to us wisdom equal to the mighty power that Thou hast put at our command, that we may have a passion for service, and that God may use us as His own instrument for establishing peace and righteousness in all the earth. Endue us with the gift of Thy Spirit for the duties of the day. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

STREET CAR SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a report from the Public Utilities Commission for the District of Columbia in response to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not yet seen the report. I should like to examine it and see what should be done with it. Let it lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will order it to the table, then.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Minnesota Association of Cleaners and Dyers, of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the classification of their trade as nonessential, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the J. R. Watkins Medical Co., of Winona, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on nonbeverage alcohol, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the F. A. Patrick Co., of Duluth, Minn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the revenue bill protecting merchants against increased taxes on profits not yet realized by reason of their absorption by readjustment of prices in future, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Schaub Bros., of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on clothing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4891) making certain officers of the Army eligible for appointment as chief of staff corps and departments (Rept. No. 567).

A bill (S. 4892) to amend section 4 of Chapter V of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, approved July 9, 1918, and to make said amendment retroactive (Rept. No. 568); and

A bill (S. 4893) transferring the tract of land known as Craney Island from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, and transferring the tract of land known as Fishermans Island from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to the jurisdiction of the War Department (Rept. No. 569).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4923) providing for the furnishing of uniforms, accouterments, and equipment to any officer of the Navy or of the Marine Corps or midshipman at the Naval Academy by the Government at cost; to the Committee on Naval affairs.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4924) to amend section 336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the annual report on the statistics of commerce and navigation of the United States with foreign countries; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 4925) granting certain abandoned military reservations to the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4926) granting an increase of pension to Charles Wiley (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4927) granting an increase of pension to Newell Strout (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

JOHN M. BROWNING, OF OGDEN, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it may be read, and then I shall ask the Senate to indulge me for just a moment in speaking upon the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 174) extending the thanks of Congress to John M. Browning, of Ogden, Utah, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, presented to John M. Browning, of Ogden, Utah, for his ingenuity in perfecting the Browning automatic shoulder and machine guns now being used so effectively by the United States Army in France and for his loyalty and patriotism to serve for the period of the war in supervising the manufacture of his guns for quick production; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems, devices, and inscription, to be presented to Mr. Browning.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That when the medal shall have been struck the President shall cause a copy of this joint resolution to be engrossed on parchment, and shall transmit the same, together with the medal, to Mr. Browning, to be presented to him in the name of the people of the United States of America.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That a sufficient sum of money to carry this resolution into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I introduced this joint resolution at the request of many of the leading men of the United States. I want it to go to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration. I doubt very much, owing to the modesty of John M. Browning, whether there are many people in the United States who know who John M. Browning is.

I hold in my hand an article from the Forum, prepared by Mr. John Bruce Mitchell, headed "Browning—'Gunman' for United States." I ask the indulgence of the Senate to read the article, so that Senators may understand who this modest man is, the inventor of the greatest machine gun in the world. In this article what he has done in the past by way of invention of small arms will appear, and there is no question but that he is the greatest inventor of firearms in the world.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator that he allow the Secretary to read it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to have that done. I ask that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the Forum for May:

"BROWNING—'GUNMAN' FOR UNITED STATES.

"[By John Bruce Mitchell.]

"'Who is Browning?'

"Practically everyone the length and breadth of the country was asking this question on the morning that the newspapers announced that the United States War Department had adopted the 'Browning machine gun.'

"It was a natural question. Few, outside of his own townspeople and those who are connected with the manufacture of firearms, had ever heard of this man.

"'Lewis' and 'Maxim' are well-known names. When the controversy came up over the matter of machine guns for our new Army those names were most frequently heard. It was the late Lord Kitchener, 'K. of K.,' who first made practical use of the machine gun in warfare. He used the Maxim gun. Then the Lewis gun came into existence. And when it was finally announced that our Government was giving an official test to a Browning machine gun—and later there came the news that we had adopted this gun—everyone, it seems, was puzzled and asked, 'Why not the Lewis or the Maxim gun?'

"It was one of the most critical times in history; a time when the very best in firearms was needed. And because the Lewis and the Maxim machine guns were well known and the Browning gun was not, it was but natural that most of us should look a trifle askance at the announcement. Everyone felt that it was no time for experiments, no time for guesswork. 'Why not adopt a gun we all know about?' seemed to be in every mind.

"'Browning? Browning? I'll bet his name never appeared on a firearm!' one excited retired Government official declared.

"He was right. Up to the time that John M. Browning, of Ogden, Utah, perfected this new machine gun his name had not appeared on any gun. Yet—

"Every Winchester rifle; every Remington shotgun; every Remington automatic rifle; every Colt machine gun; every Colt automatic pistol, such as our Army officers carry; every one of the million army pistols manufactured by a Belgian concern—every one of these, and more, was a Browning gun!

"He invented all of them!

"And of the millions upon millions of these firearms, known and carried in every quarter of the globe, not one bore his name.

"There was a time when Wilhelm, Kaiser of the German Empire, proudly carried a handsome pistol presented to him by Albert, King of Belgium.

"John M. Browning invented it.

"When Admiral Robert E. Peary planted the Stars and Stripes at the North Pole he had a Winchester repeating rifle, model '92, in his hand.

"John M. Browning invented it.

"When on that fatal summer day in 1914 a Serbian fanatic shot an Austrian archduke to death and precipitated the world war, he did it with an automatic pistol.

"John M. Browning invented it.

"An Englishman of title, on a government mission to this country, had occasion to call on Mr. Browning at his home in Ogden. The English official bowed low.

"'Sir John M. Browning,' he asked?

"'John M. Browning, sir,' snapped Mr. Browning. The Englishman took the hint and called him 'Mister' after that. However, the Englishman was correct. Mr. Browning had every right to be addressed as 'Sir,' because early in 1914 King Albert of Belgium conferred upon him the decoration of 'Chevalier de l'Ordre de Leopold.'

"It is an attractive decoration, so it is said. Mr. Browning has tucked it away in some mysterious place—never even exhibited it, much less worn it.

"So it is of no use to look in the Almanach de Gotha or even in Who's Who in America for information concerning Mr. Browning. His name does not appear in those interesting volumes.

"Not one in a thousand, probably not one in ten thousand, who has carried Winchesters, Remingtons, Colts, Stevens, and such familiar firearms into the woods during the game season, or used them at target practice, coupled the name of Browning, when they read about his machine gun, with their weapons. But despite the fact that various names and corporations appear on these guns the man who created them, the man who modified and improved and simplified them, was this same John M. Browning.

"There is no Browning arms plant in Ogden. There is a well-equipped shop where Mr. Browning 'putters around,' as he himself puts it, but he does not manufacture firearms. He doesn't have to. He invents them and lets the other fellow manufacture them while he banks his royalties.

"Sixty-six years ago, however, there was a gunshop in what was then the little town of Ogden. It was owned and operated by Jonathan Browning, father of the inventor of the Browning machine gun. The Brownings are Americans through and through. In the early forties Jonathan Browning left his home in Tennessee and journeyed to Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he plied his trade as gunsmith and general 'tinker.' He set up a shop there and made guns for the pioneers. He also mended broken plows and leaking kettles and did all sorts of tinkering. In 1852 he packed his shop equipment into an ox cart and set out for Ogden. This 'equipment' consisted of a bag full of tools and an ancient wooden foot-power lathe. It took him a month to make the trip.

"John M. Browning was born in Ogden two years later, and almost from babyhood he played in his father's gun shop. Back of this old lathe was a scrap heap, such as is found in every shop of this kind. It contained old broken and otherwise seemingly useless gun barrels, bits of flint and percussion cap locks, and other 'junk.'

"This scrap heap and the ancient lathe were destined to play a big part in the world's history of firearms.

"When 'Jack' Browning was 13 he wanted a gun. The only way to get it, so far as he could see, was to make it. He got busy with that scrap heap and before long he had turned out a gun that seemed to suit him. His father examined it carefully, and it is said that the old man almost wept with pride and joy and told his boy that he had 'done well.' It is also said that this was high praise, indeed, from the sturdy old gunmaker, but that secretly, to friends when the boy could not hear and become 'spoiled' by praise, the old gentleman vowed that 'Jack' has made a better gun than I could make.'

"The gun that this 13-year-old boy made worked admirably, and the Browning larder was kept supplied with game. The boy's brothers wanted guns 'like Jack's,' so the boy made guns for them.

"That same year he astonished his father by exhibiting original designs for breech mechanism, which he had whittled out of wood. He worked in between school time in his father's gun shop. When he was 25 he perfected a single-shot rifle that was soon in great demand out there. Orders came thick and fast. With his brothers he turned out about 500 of these rifles, an improvement over every rifle that was known up to that time.

"One of these single-shot rifles fell into the hands of officials of the Winchester Arms Co., and a man went out to Ogden with all speed to find the man who made it. They found young Browning.

"'Will you show us how it is made?' he was asked.

"'Certainly,' he responded, and the official was amazed at the manner in which they turned out these rifles by hand.

"'Is it patented?'

"It certainly was patented.

"'Will you sell us the patent?'

"Young Browning did not know. He had made a good thing out of it. He was working from early until late trying to fill orders. It seemed rather poor business to sell a patent that was keeping him in all the work he could attend to. But the Winchester man named a figure that made the young inventor blink. He sold his patent, and that design was the basis of the first Winchester single-shot rifles of all calibers.

"A complete list of the weapons Mr. Browning has invented would only be understood by an expert in arms. Roughly, his work includes the following:

"Every rifle that the Winchester Arms Co. has produced, from the single-shot to the repeating rifles. This includes the world-famous models of 1886, 1890, 1892, 1894, 1895, and 1897. Every new model brought out by this company has been a Browning product.

"Every gun manufactured by the famous Fabrique Nationale, of Liege, Belgium. More than a million of these were manufactured before the war, and Mr. Browning received royalties on them up to that time.

"Every automatic pistol manufactured by the Colts Rapid Fire Arms Co., which includes all of the pistols carried by the United States Army officers. These in all calibers from .22 to .45.

"The Colt machine gun.

"The Remington shotgun.

"The Remington repeating rifle.

"The Stevens rifle.

"The box magazine used by the United States in the Spanish War.

"Only an old-timer, acquainted with the guns of a couple of generations ago, can fully appreciate the genius of Mr. Browning. Just as Edison is the wizard of electricity, so is Mr. Browning the wizard of firearms. When he turned out his famous 1886 model rifle it was so superior to all others that they were practically relegated to the scrap heap. That model is still made for a high-power gun of .33 caliber.

"He also invented the lever shotgun, and his 1890 model has outsold all other models of rifles in the world. It was Mr. Browning who was responsible for the radical change in rifle calibers. Men of to-day who were familiar with firearms 30 years ago can remember that the calibers of .22, .32, .38, .40, and .44 seemed as set and permanent as the everlasting hills. But Mr. Browning developed such calibers as the '30-30,' the '25-20,' and others known to sportsmen the world over.

"For many years the bright nickel barrel and the round revolving chamber marked the revolver. To-day that type is not so familiar. We see more and more that ugly, flat, cold-blooded looking weapon, the automatic. It is the most powerful single-hand weapon made, and automatically shoots to kill. It is the work of Mr. Browning.

"One day Mr. Browning took a square piece of oak, bored a hole exactly the size of a .40-caliber bullet in it, placed the muzzle of a .40-caliber rifle against it so that the bullet would go through the hole, and tried an important experiment.

"He had figured out that there was a great deal of wasted force in gas caused by the combustion of the powder. He wanted to make sure how much force there was to this. He took no chances, but fastened the rifle against the board, attached a cord to the trigger, and yanked. Fortunately, it was a long cord, because the force of the gas knocked the rifle back halfway across the room. This was the basis of his automatics, the basis of his famous Browning gun which is now being turned out wholesale and shipped across to France.

"At the time Mr. Browning made his test he was asked about it.

"'I'm trying to harness the "kick," he declared, "solely."'

"They laughed. It was 'one of John's jokes,' they said.

"It was a mighty important joke. Soon he had utilized the power of the gas in such a manner that a part of this wasted pressure was transferred to the breech mechanism and made to operate the gun. One pull of the trigger and the rebound of the force fired the weapon a second time, this rebound fired it a third time, and so on until he soon had a gun that, with a single pull of the trigger, would fire 600 bullets in less than a minute.

"The outcome of these experiments was the automatic firearm. From that the famous old Colt machine gun, at the time one of the best in the world. It was adopted by the United States Army and Navy more than 20 years ago. It was the only machine gun we used during the Spanish War. During the Boxer uprising in China a detachment of our marines with only two of these Colt machine guns—Browning's invention—saved the foreign legations from destruction and their inmates from butchery.

"In 1914, at the outbreak of this war, the only plant in the United States for the manufacture of machine guns was turning out this weapon, and quantities of them were sold to the allied Governments.

"When matters began to look as though we would get into the fight there came a demand from our Ordnance Department for machine guns. Experts began investigations. The Lewis gun was conceded to be a 'wonder.' It did terrible execution. But there was one drawback, it was claimed—even the lightest of these Lewis guns could not be fired by a single man except under the very best circumstances. And in our present form of warfare there is no such thing as any 'best of circumstances.'

"Meanwhile Mr. Browning continued to 'putter' about his workshop in Ogden. He was working on an improvement of the machine gun.

"This wizard of firearms has never been contented to sit back after one big achievement and rest on his laurels. Sometimes he takes a bit of a fishing trip by way of rest, then back again to his shop to try and make still better what has just been conceded to be his best.

"He knew what was wanted—a rifle as light as the average service gun that an enlisted man might use as he would an ordinary rifle and yet, by a single pressure of the finger, pour an endless stream of bullets into the enemy.

"This was out of the question, of course. But he did the next best thing—he perfected a machine gun that is no heavier than the average rifle sportsmen use for moose and bear. In fact, a lighter rifle than that used by African hunters for the biggest game, yet this machine gun that he turned out can be lifted to the shoulder as any gun and 40 bullets directed upon the enemy in less than two and one-half seconds—a stream of bullets directed as one would direct a garden hose.

"Then he turned out the heavier machine gun, a water-cooled affair.

"There was a loud clamor about the delay in adopting a machine gun. A louder clamor because the Lewis gun was not adopted. But all this came from men who did not know.

"'It has paid us to wait, because we now have the very best machine guns in the world,' declared Secretary of War Baker.

"On the 27th of February history was made in connection with machine guns. On that date occurred the Government tests of the Browning machine guns at Congress Heights, a few miles from Washington. Three hundred people witnessed those remarkable tests, including British, French, Belgian, and Italian Army officers on duty in Washington. There were many Senators and Congressmen, our own Army officers, and probably fifty or more writers for the press and magazines.

"'A success!' was the unanimous verdict after the test.

"The lighter gun was first tried. The 15-pound arm shoots 20 or 40 bullets at one time, either from the shoulder or the hip. One move of a lever cocks the weapon, one pressure of the finger discharges it, and the shots pour out as fast as one can follow the other from the muzzle. It is an air-cooled gun and works automatically after the first shot by means of the gas pressure. If desirable the gun may be operated to shoot every time the trigger is pulled. In general defense, however, the soldier would use the former method, and spray the advancing enemy with 40 bullets before 6 shots could be fired from the ordinary repeating arm. The standard cartridges used by our forces in France in the Springfield and modified Enfield guns are used in this gun. The only tool necessary for taking apart the gun is the edge of a cartridge. One man operates it quite alone, feeding the clips and shooting.

"Arm a body of men with these and a hundred could mow down a couple of regiments. Or for advance nothing could stand up under them.

"The wicked weapon, however—the weapon that is doubtless destined to be heard from with our troops—is the Browning heavy machine gun. This is water-cooled and works on a tripod, but it weighs only 32 pounds. In the test 20,000 rounds were fired without a break or a malfunction of any sort. In another test out of 20,000 shots there were but three misses, due each time to a bad cartridge. In a supreme test 39,500 shots were fired in such instantaneous succession that the report sounded like one noise. Then the gear gave way. But no such test would ever be made in actual warfare, as such guns are worked in pairs, one to rest to cool, be reloaded, and set back in place while the other is operating. This gun is to be used for aviation service, stripped of its water-cooled jacket, as the air will serve as a cooler. In this shape it weighs but 22½ pounds.

"The details of this test are history. They astounded the world. The verdict from everyone, everywhere, was: 'This is the best machine gun made.'

"It was 51 years ago that John M. Browning made his first gun. He has been making them, inventing new ones, improving old ones, ever since.

"And for the first time in his more than half a century of gun-making he has permitted his name to be used in connection with a firearm.

"It is little wonder that he was not widely known. It is little wonder that many people looked askance when it was announced that the Government had adopted the Browning gun or that they asked, 'Who is Browning?'

"Go to any big gun-manufacturing concern in the world and use his name and you will find out that this man is known. It is said that there was not a firearm plant in the world of the modern type but what, before the present war, was paying some sort of a royalty to a 'Yankee chap named Browning.'

"'Browning?' they would repeat. 'Ah, yes; the American wizard of firearms. See this gun and that one, this appliance, that improvement? His! We must pay royalty to use it.'

"Thomas A. Edison's strides from the day he sold newspapers on a train and rigged up a little laboratory in one corner of a baggage car up to now have been no greater than those of Mr. Browning from that 13-year-old day when he turned out his first gun on an old wooden foot-power lathe up to his latest achievement, the 'Browning machine guns.'

"His income is, naturally, enormous. When the Kaiser tore up the Belgian treaty and marched through that country he put a stop to some big royalties that were coming from the Fabrique Nationale, but Mr. Browning's machine guns will be squaring that little impertinence before long.

"'They say' his income in royalties is about a million a year. It wouldn't be at all surprising, especially in these times.

"If he were at his shop, one would find him, overalls and jumpers, at a bench softly whistling as he worked away on some new device for improving a gun or pistol. If at home, one would quite likely find him in a plainly furnished living room, sitting back in an armless chair, playing 'The Blue Bells of Scotland' on a banjo.

"Those are Mr. Browning's chief indoor sports—tinkering with firearms or playing the banjo.

"For sport he prefers a mountain stream and a hatband full of trout flies in summer, or up in Wyoming in the hunting season after 'b'ar' and other worthy game.

"He is 6 feet 3 inches tall, straight up and down as an Indian, and as vigorous as most men of 30. He never took to 'citified ways,' and doesn't bother a tailor, preferring the ready-made garments. A very narrow, straight collar, half a size too large—worn for comfort and not for show, he says—any sort of a suit handy, and he's ready for the first emergency call.

"With him an 'emergency call' is generally a wire from some firearms concern asking him to come on and help with a model. One concern had experts working a year to make a smaller caliber of one of Browning's guns. Then they sent for him. He looked over their drawings, looked over his model to refresh his memory—he has made so many they are difficult to classify at a glance—and started to make a few drawings himself. By night he had completed the work. They handed him a check for $10,000 and a certain agreement concerning royalties, and he went back to his little shop and his banjo.

"Our Ordnance Department has promised that by June they will be sending Browning machine guns over to France faster than they can be used.

"Meanwhile John M. Browning, 'gunman,' is strumming on his banjo out in Ogden and 'thinking up' improvements on what is already conceded to be the best machine gun in the world."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a word as to the joint resolution. I know of no one whose services at this time more entitle him to such recognition as is contemplated by this resolution than Mr. Browning, but I very much doubt the wisdom of the precedent which it will establish. I fear that once Congress begins to adopt resolutions granting gold medals to distinguished citizens we shall be overwhelmed with a flood of them in behalf both of the worthy and of the unworthy, and that, as a consequence, our time will be largely occupied in considering and voting for or rejecting them. For that reason I think the matter should be very carefuly considered by this body before it finally votes upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have asked that the resolution go to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration; but I will say to the Senator from Colorado that there are precedents on which this resolution is based. At this time I do not want to go into the other details as to why I think the resolution ought to become a law.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely make that suggestion. I do not want the Senator from Utah to construe it as committing me against the joint resolution; the thought occurred to me during the reading of the article, and consequently I gave expression to it as worthy of reflection.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I shall be content to have the joint resolution go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I hope to have an opportunity to appear before the committee in behalf of the resolution. I want to call the committee's attention to the unselfishness of Mr. Browning in not demanding royalties from the Government of the United States on the Browning machine guns now being manufactured and used in the present world war. In this particular case not a million dollars but millions of dollars have been given by this very patriotic citizen to the Government of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR JAMES.

Mr. BECKHAM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 302), which was read and referred to the Commitee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, late a Senator from the State of Kentucky, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON, subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SUPPLY OF MINERAL OILS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on September 11, instant, the alarming information was communicated to the Senate by the Bureau of Mines that there will be a deficit of a million barrels of gasoline this year. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], upon receipt of that information, submitted to the Senate a very timely resolution calling for information from the Bureau of Mines concerning stocks on hand of petroleum and other mineral oils, and the probable consumption thereof. Supplementary thereto I now submit a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Montana will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 303) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That, with the information called for by Senate resolution No. 301, the Bureau of Mines be directed to send to the Senate any information it may have in regard to the extent to which the threatened shortage in the supply of crude petroleum and other mineral oils in this country will be relieved by the speedy enactment of Senate bill 2812, passed by the Senate on the 8th day of January, 1918.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE BUILDING SITUATION.

Mr. CALDER. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 304) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the War Industries Board be directed to transmit to the Senate all orders promulgated by that board relative to the construction and alteration of public or private buildings, and to advise the Senate under what authority of law said orders were issued.

Mr. CALDER. I introduce this resolution because articles appearing in the newspapers within the last day or two indicate that the War Industries Board has promulgated orders which, in effect, will completely destroy the building industry of the country. The building-material industry of the country has an investment of $4,000,000,000 in their business, and the new buildings constructed in the Nation in the last prewar year—1916—totaled $1,800,000,000. As I understand these orders, they prevent the construction of a barn, a silo, or even a private dwelling house or of any building of a private character without the permission of the Federal Government. If it be necessary in order to win the war to destroy this great wealth and tax producing industry, of which it seems to me there can be few more essential, we ought to know it and the reasons for it, and the people must adjust themselves to it; but if this great business can be saved, at least in part, some way should be found to do so.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of inquiry be now considered.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MINIMUM WAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he will not allow the bill to go over until Tuesday—and I understand we are going to adjourn until Tuesday—because a number of Senators who are tied up now with official business of the Senate desired to be here this morning if the bill were to be taken up. So far they have not appeared in the Chamber, and I simply make that request, not by way of delay, because I do not think there will be very much delay, but there are some Senators, as I have said, who desire to speak upon the measure. If the Senator will consent to let it go over, I have no question that the bill can be taken up on Tuesday and disposed of on that day. Is there any real reason why it should pass before next Tuesday?

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is no reason other than the desire, of course, to push legislation along when there is an opportunity to do so. As I understand, there is nothing else to occupy the time of the Senate to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. And there will be nothing else on Tuesday. The only reason I make the request is because I was asked to do so in behalf of the Senators to whom I referred, who are absent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I dislike very much to agree to have the bill go over, for we never know from day to day what else may come up and occupy the time of the Senate. I should really like very much to have this measure considered to-day. It has been on the calendar for some time; it has been favorably reported; and, so far as I know, there is very little opposition to it in the Senate. I really think there is quite a general sentiment in favor of the measure in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I believe that to be the case. I do not think there is any question that, when the bill is considered, a majority of the Senate will vote for it, and, therefore, there is no real danger of the bill being delayed next Tuesday. There will be no objection to its consideration at that time, so far as I am concerned, and there would be none now if the bill could be discussed by the Senators to whom I have referred. However, I have fulfilled my duty, and the Senator can judge whether or not he wants to let it go over until Tuesday.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I dislike to refuse to yield to the request, but I prefer to have the bill considered to-day. There is nothing else to occupy the time of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment. If no amendment is proposed, the bill will be ordered engrossed for a third reading and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time by title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I can not imagine that the Senate wants to pass a bill of this importance without having it read. I have not the slightest idea what it proposes.

Mr. KENYON. The bill has been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, and read the third time. It is subject to debate now; but it is not subject to amendment without unanimous consent.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I do not think there were six Senators on the floor of the Senate when the bill was made the unfinished business. It is a matter of no consequence to me; but I must protest against a method of business under which a bill of this importance is taken up and made the unfinished business when there are only six Senators on the floor. Now it is proposed to submit it to a vote without anybody knowing what is in it. I myself have not the slightest idea of what is in it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if there were not more than six Senators present at the time the bill was made the unfinished business it is not the fault of those who were present urging the consideration of the bill. The Senate adjourned at about 3 o'clock on Wednesday, and Senators had all day yesterday to consider and look into this bill. It has been twice unanimously reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia; it has passed the House without a dissenting vote; a report by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], concise and clear, has been on file in the Senate since the 7th day of June; and if Senators do not know about the bill it is their own fault.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator that when the bill was taken up on Wednesday by the Senate it was taken up in the regular way, considered as in Committitee of the Whole, passed through the amendment stage, and reported to the Senate before there was any request that it go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand the bill is now on its third reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read a third time. It is subject to debate, but not subject to amendment without unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a right to demand that the bill be read before it is passed, as it is on its third reading. I ask that the bill be read, and then we will know what is in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have no objection to the bill being read, although, of course, it was read in full on Wednesday.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was on its second reading. The rules and the Constitution require that a bill be read three times.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This bill came up immediately after a vote was taken on the agricultural stimulation bill, carrying an appropriation of $50,000,000. So it must have been taken up at an opportune time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks for the third reading of the bill in full, and is entitled to have it. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill was read the third time at length.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge what the intention was in the use of these words on page 3, beginning in line 19:

None of the members shall receive any salary as such.

Is it the intention that they shall receive a salary in some other way, by donations or by appropriations for some other purpose?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the idea was that they should not receive salary; that they should serve without salary.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not simply say, then, that none of the members shall receive a salary?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have no objection to striking out the words "as such." I will accept that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I think they ought to go out, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I recognize that it would require unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent that the words "as such," in line 20 of page 3 of the bill, be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that would open up the bill entirely for any sort of amendment, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I mean if that unanimous consent is given.

Mr. SMOOT. I only ask unanimous consent for the purpose of making this one amendment. Of course, if other amendments are sought to be offered they will require unanimous consent, just the same as this.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not see that this amendment is material at all. There are a couple of words there that might just as well have been left out, but I do not feel that they affect the measure at all. I feel disposed to object myself.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has that right, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would rule, as a matter of first impression, that if the bill should be opened up to amendment it would be open to amendment. It would have to go back to the Senate for this amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that the Senate committee placed in their bill a per diem compensation for the board. The House, in passing their bill, struck that out, or, at least, did not allow it; and it was very evident from the debate that there was no intention that the members of this board should be paid any sum from any source. That is the intention of the bill. I realize that those words might be construed to mean that they could be paid from some other source, but that is not the purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. They could be paid as private individuals, but not as officers.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator has stated the case exactly; but it seems to me that the words "as such" are simply an invitation to some individuals to pay the members of the board a salary, and there is nothing here to prevent it. In fact, as I say, the words "as such" are an invitation to them to do it, or to have the members paid a compensation in some other way.

Mr. KENYON. That would simply be presenting the members of the board with a gratuity, which certainly no honorable man would accept.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know as to that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry; and my excuse for making it is that I have been necessarily absent from the city and know nothing as to the status of this bill.

I heard a remark made a moment ago that seemed to indicate that the bill is not open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. That arises, if I may ask, from what reason?

The VICE PRESIDENT. From the regular parliamentary procedure. This bill was taken up upon motion. It was read in the Committee of the Whole. No amendment was presented. It was reported to the Senate. No amendment was offered in the Senate. It was ordered to its third reading. It has been read in full the third time. The rules of the Senate provide that it is not now open to amendment except by unanimous consent. The only thing to do is to discuss it, vote on it, or move to recommit it to the committee. That is all that is left under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. REED. The statement of the Vice President is perfectly clear. I did not know the status of the bill. That was why I was inquiring. In that situation I can see, of course, why it would not be open to amendment.

I consider it very unfortunate, Mr. President, that a bill of this importance should have drifted into a condition where it is not even open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may add further, if the Senator will pardon the Chair, that if the bill passes of course it will be subject to a motion to reconsider the passage of the bill. That right is still open.

Mr. REED. Yes; I understand. The statement of the Vice President makes the matter entirely clear. I simply did not know the position the bill had reached in the parliamentary proceedings.

I deem it highly unfortunate that a bill involving the principle that this bill contains should have reached the point where it can not even be amended, and this, as I understand, without any substantial discussion. Speaking for myself, I have had no opportunity to examine the details of the bill; but that is my own misfortune and grows out of conditions I could not control. This much, however, is plain: The bill seeks to take away the right of private contract.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that this bill, if it becomes a law, instead of helping the class of people it is designed to serve, will result in discouraging their employment at all, and by that means will restrict to a minimum the employment of women and girls over 18 years of age in industrial callings in the District?

Mr. REED. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In reply to the statement made by the Senator from Colorado I will state that the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association of the District of Columbia sent a representative before the Senate committee and indorsed the policy embraced in the minimum-wage bill—the bill we are considering at the present time. So I should not think it was the purpose or the object of the employer class of this city and District to discriminate against women and boys on account of the minimum wage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it may be that this legislation will go through notwithstanding any protest. It is of that class of legislation which repudiates the right of an American citizen to take care of himself. It is based upon the idea that the human family must be constantly in leading strings and under tutelage and protection. It assumes that an American citizen has not sufficient sense to make his own bargains, but that there are some other American citizens who can with absolute infallibility make contracts for him. It is based upon a principle of intellectual serfdom. Its underlying thought is individual rights and responsibilities should be merged into general governmental supervision. If we have this sort of legislation long enough, we will not have left in this world anything but a few political bosses and many industrial slaves.

There never was a time in the history of the world when there was as little reason for bringing forward such legislation. Why bring forward an act to fix minimum wages at a time when the minimum wage paid everywhere in the United States is more than the work is really worth, and when the maximum wages are reaching a prohibitory point? There is not an able-bodied laborer in the United States to-day who can not get from $3 to $5 for his day's work.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator understand that the bill applies only to women and minors under 18 years of age?

Mr. REED. Yes; I understand.

Mr. KENYON. Who have always been under peculiar guardianship. It applies to women and boys who can not vote.

Mr. REED. Do women need protection? Are women unable to take care of themselves? Do women need guardians in this day when my distinguished friend is insisting that they are so much more capable of running the Government than men that we should have them vote in order to improve the Government? Yet you, by this bill, class them with children and put them in the contemptible position of needing guardianship. In one breath you stand here telling us they are capable of performing all the duties of citizenship; that they ought to be allowed to vote upon every question, local and national; that they should be made eligible to all offices of honor, of profit, and of trust; and that they are entitled to these privileges because of their intellectual equality if not their mental superiority over men, and in the next breath you say they are but children and they need guardians and commissions to look after their wage. Where now are the knightly ladies whose flaunting banners have recently been borne back and forth in front of the White House and who have demanded with militant proesses militant rights? Where are they, that they do not rise to repudiate and denounce this ignominious classification with infants, this demand that they be placed under tutelage, and that they have appointed for them guardians ad litem, who will look after every contract they make for their wages?

Some women are lawyers. Is it intended, I wonder, if a lady lawyer shall make a bargain with her client for a fee that she shall first be forced to go down before some board composed of gentlemen with thick heads and little experience, for that is the ordinary composition out of which such local boards have generally been made, and shall she have these gentlemen fix her minimum fee? To what base and ignoble mind must we trace this insult leveled against the intelligence of women? What is the purpose of classifying women in this way at this time?

Let us go to the 18-year-old boy and consider this bill a minute in connection with him. The 18-year-old boy has natural guardians in his father and mother. It is their business to see that he is not overreached in his transactions, and under the law they are entitled to his wage, and they have imposed upon them the duty of his support. So of the 18-year-old girl. If peradventure these boys are deprived of the protection of their natural parents the law makes provision for the appointment of personal guardians who shall conserve their rights and protect them against wrong. The legal guardian reports to a court. A curator of the property of a minor can be appointed, and is appointed.

A board to fix wages! If they fix the wages too high, if they fix the wages one single penny beyond the point that competition fixes the wage, the result will be that the merchant will simply decline to employ the lady and will hire a man clerk whose wages are not fixed by a board, or he will decline to employ the boy under 18, and will employ a boy who is 19 whose wages are not fixed by a board. The very moment the board of thick-headed and inexperienced men—and I am speaking of them now in the full light of what has happened in this and other communities, for the men who take positions on such boards are generally men who amount to very little in any vocation of life—the very minute the board fixes $1.10 a day for the wage of a boy under 18 years of age and the employer finds he can hire in the competitive market a person over the age of 18 for $1, he will employ that person, and the person under the age of 18 will go without any work whatever.

The very minute you actually by law raise the wages of the 18-year-old boy or of a woman above the point that competition has fixed, these people will be turned out of employment. They will be denied a chance to earn a living. This bill ought to be entitled, "A bill to deprive boys 18 years of age and under and women of any age whatsoever of a chance to earn a living."

Put a little common sense to work in the consideration of measures of this kind. Here is a merchant at the present time who can employ a male or a female of any age in his establishment. You propose now to say to him, "You shall not employ a woman unless you pay a certain wage fixed by a board." Suppose the competitive price is $2 a day. Suppose the board fixes the price at $1.90 a day. They have not done the woman any good. They have not raised her wages a penny. If they fix the wages at $2.25 a day, then the whole competitive field of men being open and the merchant having the opportunity to go there and hire men will immediately employ men, and the woman will be without a job. She may have children to support, she may have a sick mother to support, she may have house rent to pay; but she can not get a job. The board by its ruling has deprived her of the chance to support herself.

Suppose a boy is 18 years of age. He is not worth as much, speaking on the average, as a man of more years and experience. The whole competitive field is open. He wants to get a job in a store. Competition has fixed the wages so that the boy will get about $2 a day and a man of 25 will get about $3 a day. I am using purely arbitrary figures. The boy has a chance to get a job under those circumstances. He has a chance to go where men who are experienced are working and induce an employer to give him a job at what he is worth in competition with the men. After a little while he gets experience and can command the same wages as the men.

Now comes this foolish law, this legislative quackery, and says to the boy, "You can not go in there and work because the proprietor of the store refuses to pay a certain wage fixed by a board," who in the vast majority of cases are necessarily ignorant of the business conducted or the work to be performed.

So this boy who is willing to work and needs the work goes without the opportunity to earn a livelihood.

I repeat, you ought to entitle your bill "An act to prevent a boy under 18 years of age from getting a job," and, further, "to prevent a woman of any age whatsoever from obtaining a position."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator suggested that the title of the bill should be amended. I will state to the Senator that he seems to lose sight of the fact that the title of the bill is very correctly stated, to prescribe a minimum wage. The Senator talks about a boy not being able to get a job. The bill provides that you shall not employ a minor or a woman without sufficient influence to protect her own rights for a mere wage of three or four or five dollars a week when her services are worth ten or fifteen dollars a week. So I think the bill has a correct title. It is to protect the minor and woman against having to work, not for a livelihood, but for a mere pittance.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if this bill proposed to establish a board to fix the wages of every person inside and outside the District who toils, without regard to age or sex, you might provide a scale of wages that would protect the boys and would protect the women. I hope I may have the attention of the Senator who just interjected his remarks. But you do not propose to fix a general scale of wages that must be paid for all kinds of labor and to all classes of people. You propose to fix a minimum scale of wages for women and boys under 18. When you fix those wages and do not fix the wages of other people you have this condition: If the board fix the wages of the women and the boys under 18 at a price above where they are placed by competitive conditions the employer will go into the competitive field which is left, to wit, among the men who are above 18 years of age, and will employ those men to the exclusion of the women and the boy who is under 18, and your bill will injure the people you seek to aid, because it impairs and may even take away their chance to make a living.

You do not propose to make the employers give them a job; you do not propose to carry your regulations to the point where you will say to the proprietor, "You must give a job to this boy, who has appeared before the board and has shown his competency, and you must pay him certain wages." You simply say to the employer, "You can not employ the boy at all unless you will pay a certain amount of wages, but you have a perfect right, the absolute privilege, to go into the general field of labor and to employ somebody else to take that job, and to pay that somebody else whatever wages you can get him for."

The bill is simply monstrous. It is another sample of that half-baked legislation with which Congress has recently been disfiguring the statute books. It leaves everything out of consideration except the desire in the heart of its author to really do something to benefit mankind. Every one of these bills is the fruit of kind and loving minds, and generally of minds that have not thought very far into the question. We had a bill passed here that provided that women should not work more than a certain number of hours in certain public places, and a lot of poor women were discharged and men took their jobs.

Why, Mr. President, the trouble with this bill and the trouble with all this class of legislation is that either you are going too far or you are not going far enough. If you are going to regulate the wages of a part of the people, then you must regulate the wages of all people. If you regulate the wages of part of the people and do not regulate the wages of all, the employer is under no compulsion to pay the wages fixed, because he can have resort to the plain expedient of hiring a man whose wages have not been fixed. Accordingly, the man whose wages have been fixed may starve to death for want of a job. You undertake to preserve a competitive system for people just over 18 years of age and to destroy the competitive system and have a board to regulate prices for people just under 18 years of age; you allow the competitive system to regulate the wages of the young man as soon as he has passed his eighteenth birthday, but up to that point you fix a price. If you fix the price a particle below the competitive price, you will do him no good; if you fix it above the competitive price a single jot or tittle, he will not get a job.

I again protest, however, in the name of the ladies. I look at these champions of the women who have asserted that women are the equals of men in all respects and the superior of man in most respects, these doughty advocates of woman suffrage who tell us that women ought to be admitted to every office of state; that they are smart enough and able enough to fill any position in life and to help control the affairs of this Government; and yet at the same time they bring in a bill here bottomed upon the idea that women have not sense enough to make a bargain for themselves; that they are children; that they are infants; that they need public guardianship. I suppose we will get some guardians about as well qualified to perform these duties as was the fuel administrator of the city of Washington to perform his. All will remember last winter and the gentleman who closed all of the coal yards, destroyed the machinery for coal distribution, and issued a mandate closing the churches on Sunday and opening the theaters, and then departed for some southern clime where he could bask in nature's warmth and heat.

I suppose we shall get somebody like that Federal fuel administrator who actually issued an order affecting a vast territory in the West—an order controlling their mines and regulating the output—and who absolutely did not know that in all the State of Montana there was a single coal mine, and had to be told the fact by a Senator from that State. I suppose we shall have some more intelligent regulation the equivalent of that which ordered 4,000,000 more tons of coal sent to the Northwest than could be there consumed, and left the ships that were to bear our troops and our munitions and our supplies to Europe without sufficient coal to move them from the port of New York. I suppose we shall have some more of that class of regulation which consisted in fixing the price of coal so low that certain mines could not run, but yet so high that other mines could make fabulous profits.

I assume that we shall have some more demonstrations of incapacity, which are so well illustrated by the act of those men who undertook to fit a 12-cylinder motor into every variety of flying machine that man needed to use, although the machines varied in size from one with a spread of wings of 19 feet 6 inches to one with a spread of wings 225 feet, and from a machine that will carry one man to a machine that will bear 9,000 pounds of dead-weight through a continuous flight for 500 miles.

What is the need of this bill at this hour? I see one member of the committee who pays me the compliment of his attention. Do you know—and I am addressing the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], whom I most highly esteem—do you know a single individual in the city of Washington who is not getting all the wages anybody ought to get to-day?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, so far as naming a particular individual, I do not know that I could name a particular individual; but the statistics furnished as to the investigation of wages paid within the District of Columbia, to my mind, certainly show that there are a great many who are working in stores and shops and other places who are receiving a salary of $6 or $7 a week, who should receive a greater salary than they are now being paid. As to individuals, I am not advocating this legislation from the standpoint of any particular individual.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; nobody intimates that; nobody claims that; but I thought perhaps the Senator could name one such individual, so that we could get down to a concrete instance—just one sample, one example.

Mr. President, you can not go into a store in the city of Washington to-day and find an underpaid employee. The truth is that when you go into the stores of Washington you can hardly get waited on. The reason you do not find an underpaid employee is because there is not a man, boy, or woman of ordinary intelligence and education who can not go to Government departments and get from $900 to $1,800 a year. Not only have the civil-service rules been set aside, but the country has been ransacked for help, and they come here, regardless of age, sex, or previous condition of servitude, by the thousands and tens of thousands, because they are needed, or, if they are not needed, at least there are jobs awaiting them.

Talk about labor being underpaid here. You can not get an ordinary house servant—a woman—in the city of Washington to-day for less than from $10 to $12 a week, with room and board. You can not get common labor in the city of Washington to-day for less than $3.50 to $5 a day—the commonest kind of common labor, that stops when it has worked its eight hours, and frequently stops during the time it is working its eight hours, and tells the boss not to dare complain or it will quit the job.

I wish my friends who are the authors of this bill would go out and try to employ somebody. I heard an incident, a well-authenticated incident, of a colored "lady"—and I do not say this because she was a colored "lady"; I am not telling it on the colored race—who was met by a white "woman" who asked her if she knew where she could get a washerwoman. She said, "No; I do not know where you can get a washerwoman. We wimmin's quit washing. Our men is all making five to six dollars a day, and pretty soon we are going to have you white wimmin working for us." Literally and absolutely, if things keep on a little while longer, with the increase of wages and with the drawing out of the man power and the woman power and carrying them to the fields of war, the time is going to come when labor, if there be any that can be obtained at all, will demand any price it wants, and the people who have been accustomed to hiring help will be doing their own work with their own hands.

Mr. President, I warn the Senate, and I warn the country, that this is the last time of all times when we should break down the old fundamentals of our Constitution and of our law. I know that the mention of the Constitution provokes a smile. It has become a byword and a reproach, but it is bottomed upon eternal principles that can not be destroyed without the world paying the penalty of that destruction.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he contends that this law is unconstitutional.

Mr. REED. Yes, sir; I contend that it violates the fundamental principles the Constitution was framed to protect.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that the bill is framed after the bill passed by the Oregon Legislature which went to the Supreme Court of the Untied States, the brief in behalf of which was filed by Mr. Brandeis, now an Associate Justice of that court, and it was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. That case involved the identical question.

Mr. REED. I know that decision perfectly well. I am going to ask, however, whether it applied to women of all ages.

Mr. KENYON. I have the case here. I will look that up. I am not certain.

Mr. REED. But I speak advisedly when I say that this bill violates the principles the Constitution was designed to preserve, and I care not how far a court may have gone in holding that the police powers of States may be exercised. It violates the Constitution in the sense that it destroys the right of private contract. It violates those principles which are graven in the Constitution, and which are part of our civilization, which hold that the private individual is entitled to dispose of his property and of his labor as he sees fit. It violates that great principle of Anglo-Saxon liberty which reserves to the citizen the right to make his own bargains and transact his own business; and even though courts may have found some means to reason around it, we still come back to the eternal fact that you can not violate principles of that kind without paying the penalty.

Mr. President, they tried it over in Russia. They undertook in Russia to abolish private property, and they produced anarchy; and in the fires of anarchy were forged the chains of Russian slavery. They tried it during the French Revolution, and in that fierce flame there was consumed the French Republic. Out of the smoke of that seething furnace there emerged a new tyrant and upon its embers was erected a new empire. In our country to-day there exist societies and organizations which, as far as they dare, are teaching the doctrines of the Bolsheviki. The I. W. W. is only the socialistic offshoot of that tree the trunk of which is European anarchy. The cardinal doctrine of all these kindred societies and parties is the destruction of private property, to be followed swiftly by the curtailment of individual rights. They all embrace a state interference with the right of a citizen to control his own affairs. They set up a bureaucracy, a board, a triumvirate, a something, to regulate the habits of people, the lives of people, the property of people, and in a little while they establish a tyranny more odious than any that was ever imposed upon a subject race by an oriental despot.

The danger that our country is in to-day, and the only real danger, is from that kind of propaganda which broke the eastern front and turned Russia over to the German tyrant, that almost succeeded in destroying Italy, that did breach her lines and cause the surrender or death of 200,000 troops and the loss of 2,000 cannon, that distilled its poisonous influence in country after country, even reaching into England, where, beyond any question, nothing but the wisdom of profound statesmen preserved the integrity of the British fighting line. This same poison is at work in our country, and its method of attack is to destroy all the old landmarks of the law; and we yield; we yield at a time when there is not even a temporary good to be done.

I repeat, the man who dares stand in the Senate to-day and say that wages in the District of Columbia are so low that such legislation as this is needed is making an assertion he can not sustain. I predict that it will be only a few days until you will find somebody in here with a bill to fix maximum wages.

Now, one of two things is true. You have either got to regulate the price of everything, or you might as well quit trying to regulate the price of anything. If you are going to fix rates of rent you will find that you will have to fix prices on property, and interest that is to be paid on mortgages on the property, and wages that are to be paid to employees in and about the buildings. If you are going to regulate the prices of food products in the District of Columbia, you will have to regulate the rent that tenant farmers pay and the wages that can be exacted from them by their men. If you are going to regulate the price at which a merchant shall sell his goods, you must regulate the rent that he pays and the salaries that he must pay. If you are going to regulate any one of the prices of those things that are common to all of us, which embrace wages, and dry goods, and groceries, and rents, and coal, and all of those things that go to make up the daily life of the people, then you ought to regulate all things, so that they can all be put upon the same basis.

Then, Mr. President, when you have regulated wages in the District of Columbia you will find out, if you put them too low, that your labor will leave the District of Columbia and go elsewhere. If you put them too high, then you will have done an injustice to all of the people of the District of Columbia, and every man, woman, and child in the end will be forced to pay, because in the end all these burdens are thrust back upon the people; and if you do not put them either too high or too low, you will have done no good to any human being.

Why can we not exercise a little common sense about matters of this kind? Or are we all so afraid of the ballot box or so anxious to curry favor with certain classes of people that we will pass legislation of this kind regardless of its soundness?

Let us see about wages in the District of Columbia. Let me assume that they are too low—and I do not care anything about any statistics that are 90 days old.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. Yes; I am always glad to yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator suggests the idea of currying favor with a particular class, and evidently means that support of this bill carries with it that idea. I should like to ask the Senator if opposition to a bill of this character would not also curry favor with a certain class of people?

Mr. REED. What class, I wonder? The Senator states that the merchants here are for the bill, so I certainly could not be seeking to curry favor with them by opposing what they want. Who, then?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator well knows that the employing class in a great many localities is opposed to any legislation that will have a tendency to fix a minimum wage; and he knows and I know that a great many of the employers—very likely a majority of the employers—generally speaking, are opposed to any legislation prescribing a minimum wage.

Mr. REED. The Senator now is running on another leg. A moment ago he was advocating this bill upon the ground that it was so fair and so meritorious and so altogether sweet and lovely that the merchants of this town came in and wanted it passed. Now he tells us that really it is to be very restrictive and very controlling; therefore it is to be very obnoxious. Obnoxious to whom? Not to the merchants here, but to the merchants elsewhere, to whom it will not apply, because it is limited in its jurisdiction to the District of Columbia. Now, you can not have both of those arguments. You can not stand here and try to get the Senate to vote for this bill on the ground that the merchants are for it, and then ask them to vote for it upon the ground that the merchants are against it.

The Senator's argument in one respect only reminds me of that peculiar animal spoken of by our old friend Baron Munchausen. He told of an animal, I think called the hieronymus, or by some other impossible name, which had legs on its belly and legs on its back. When they undertook to catch it with the fleetest dog or the fleetest horse they found it impossible, because the animal would run a while on the legs that were on its belly and when they became tired it would whirl over and run on the legs that were on its back. It thus always had a fresh pair of legs. So, when the Senator tells us in one of his arguments that this bill is all right because the merchants want it, and then, when I seek to apply that statement, he says that they do not want it, that it is very obnoxious to them, I insist that the Senator shall get on one pair of legs and run on that pair of legs.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I did not state that they especially wanted the measure, but that they had agreed to or approved of the measure.

Mr. REED. Well, if they approve it, they must want it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course the Senator well knows, and I know, that in dealing with legislation of this character it is dealt with more or less as a policy applying to the entire country and not merely to the District of Columbia, and I dare say that the Senator in dealing with it is dealing with it from the standpoint of its application to the entire country, and he is presenting his views here upon the question of a minimum wage not merely applying to the District of Columbia but applying to the entire country. He also knows that merchants or employing classes will possibly acquiesce in or agree to a measure when they are not very solicitous as to having it passed. I stated that they did have their man come before the committee, and he agreed to the legislation; that they would not oppose the legislation.

Mr. REED. If I understand the Senator's position, then, it is this—that they did not exactly agree to it, but that they did not exactly disagree to it; they did not exactly want it, but they were not exactly opposed to it. I can not keep him on either of these legs of back or belly. He has got on his side now. [Laughter.]

I think I will just let that matter rest there. It is inconsequential. So far as this bill is concerned, its jurisdiction is the District of Columbia. If it is to be passed as an example for other States or other communities, I beg to submit that other States and other communities can probably attend to their own business quite as well as the Congress of the United States can attend to it by a process of absent treatment. That is a species of argument that I think will not get us far. Let us stick to this bill.

I started a while ago to say, let us assume that wages are too low in the District of Columbia for any class of people. Let us say plumbers.

How far is it to Baltimore? How long would it be until there would be an exodus of plumbers over to Baltimore? The probabilities are that a fair representation of them make weekly excursions there now; not more, however, than any other class of people. How far is it to New York, to Philadelphia? If a man is a worker in iron and steel and happens to be in the District of Columbia, and wages are too low, how long does it take him to locate Hog Island, where the Government is paying wages that are ridiculously high?

Suppose it is a lady typist, a very useful avocation for women, which they fill for the most part better than men. What about them? In the first place, they can leave your office, where the salary is fixed by Congress, and they can go down here to any of these bureaus, where the salary is fixed by some dollar-a-year man, and get better wages than they are getting here; and you are in luck if you can keep them.

But suppose that that was not true; suppose that the wages generally paid to these ladies in the law offices and places of business in the city of Washington were too low, how long would it take these bright and keen young women to find out that wages were better in Baltimore or New York or Philadelphia, or Boston or Chicago or St. Louis, or any other of the cities of the country? Yet you propose to have a board sit down here and make bargains for those women.

I am not an advocate of woman suffrage. I am not one of those people who have been trying to make my way through the world hanging onto some woman's petticoat. I say now that the average young lady who runs a typewriter in an office or keeps a set of books knows better how to make a bargain for herself than anybody who will be appointed upon this board, and they are making a better living to-day probably than the men who will be appointed to supervise their right to contract.

I repeat, I know mighty few men who take positions on such boards who are of much account at home or abroad, asleep or awake, except a few of the great boards. Let it be understood that I am not speaking of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the other great commissions; I am speaking of such boards as this one. They are the intellectual wastebaskets of the country. Every fellow who can not make a living at home or who has lost out in politics or whose wife has failed to properly support him drifts into them, and, "armed with a little brief authority," he speedily begins to tell you how much sugar you can put in your coffee, and this without warrant of law, without the pretense of a statute.

Many ladies are employed in the banks of this country as bookkeepers—keen, smart business women—and you are going to put them under tutelage. You will regulate their wages. If you fix their wages a little higher than the banker thinks he ought to pay, he will get a man to do the work and the woman will be turned out of the place, because some intellectual incompetent sitting on a board has fixed the rate of wages for this free-born American citizen.

Mr. President, we have taken out of the industrial ranks of this country, due to this war directly, over 4,000,000 men up to date. We have probably taken out directly of the creative and productive classes among the women 200,000. That is a mere estimate that I make; I do not vouch for its accuracy. We are about to take out of the productive class of this country at least three and a half million more. There will be within the next eight months' time an aggregate of from seven to eight million of our people withdrawn from the productive avocations of life and put into the business of destruction. In addition to that, we have withdrawn from the ordinary productive business of life that vast army who are no longer mining iron and ore to be turned into plows and into steel beams for buildings, but who are performing that work in order that ships may be built and that guns may be made and that shells may be manufactured.

In a word, for I do not propose to prolong the illustration of a fact so patent, we are withdrawing not only the men and women who are in the Army and in the work connected with the Army, but we are withdrawing almost our entire industrial force from the business of creating and are turning them into war work, which is the work of destruction. What is the result? There is not a single place in the United States where there is not a shortage of labor unless it be some far-off swamp in some far distant State, where some Rip Van Winkle sleeps so soundly he does not know a war is on. The result is that legislation of this kind becomes ridiculous because wholly and absolutely unnecessary from my standpoint.

I repeat, the same gentlemen who are here sponsoring this bill to-day are the very men who have been in part the fathers or the sponsors or at least the advocates of legislation that is the equivalent of a maximum wage, for the man who advocates fixing a maximum price that can be charged for the use of property is doing exactly the equivalent of the man who fixes a maximum price for the use of a man's labor. I shall expect as the car of moral progress and reform rolls on to find that these gentlemen will wake up some morning and conclude that wages are too high, and we will have a bill to fix a maximum wage.

Frankly there would be a lot more sense in fixing maximum wages to-day than in fixing minimum wages, because all the indications are that there is about as much profiteering going on in the matter of wages as there is in the matter of merchandising, and the Government is encouraging it. Any girl with ordinary intelligence can come to the city of Washington and go down to a department and get a job the first day she lands at $900 a year. Two days later, having looked around a little and made a few acquaintances, she can go over to another department and hire herself out for $1,200 a year. I know instances where it has been done. So the Government is bidding against itself. If anybody in God's world, and I say it reverently, needs a guardian it is the Government of the United States.

How well this bill is drawn to make some jobs. If we keep this up a little longer I am going to introduce a bill that will represent some real statesmanship. It will be entitled "An act to provide a job for every American citizen at a living salary." That would be fair. Then I want to be on the board to administer it with a full right to fix my own salary to suit myself.

Mr. President, there are nearly enough job holders in the city of Washington to-day to reestablish the eastern front.

Mr. SMOOT. Five hundred are coming in weekly.

Mr. REED. Five hundred are coming in every week, so the Senator from Utah states, and he is nearly always accurate; and with them come "their sisters and their cousins and their aunts." Mr. President, if we could get a continuous flow of that line over to Pershing we could recruit him faster than the Germans could kill or wound his men.

How long will it be that way? How many of these boards have we created? We created a board a while back that has agents now practically in every county of the United States and almost unlimited pay rolls. This board can not do the business of fixing the wages of everybody under 18 years of age and of every woman in the city of Washington on a pay roll of $5,000 per year, the amount fixed in the bill. How is it going to hear complaints? How is it going to pass upon the merits of thousands and thousands of cases, for there are thousands and thousands of such cases, unless it has a large force to investigate and to bring out the facts?

The next appropriation bill will fix this item. How will a board with a pay roll of two people, for that is all they could get for $5,000, and one of them the secretary, perform such duties as these:

1. To investigate and ascertain the wages of women and minors in the different occupations in which they are employed in the District of Columbia.

That would take an ordinary Washington board with about 300 employees about three years.

2. To examine, through any member or authorized representative, any book, pay roll, or other record of any employer of women or minors that in any way appertains to or has a bearing upon the question of wages of any such women or minors.

Under that broad and sweeping authority every man in the city of Washington who employs a single laborer can be compelled to expose all of his books of account, and if my experience goes for anything the privilege and power will be exercised to the uttermost. In this day when you grant power you may be sure that it will be exercised.

We passed a bill authorizing the licensing of concerns engaged in business having in view solely and only the prevention of extortion or the practice of certain trust devices during this time of war. That power has been so construed that the people of the United States have been compelled to buy corn meal in order to get wheat flour. It has been so construed that you can not go into a hotel in the United States to-day but the courtly, unregulated colored gentleman who serves your meal will hand you on a piece of tissue paper a single lump of sugar and tell you that is all you can have. It has been so construed. I want the Senate to mark this, that although that law provides that its terms shall not apply to farmers, United States marshals have gone on the farms of farmers and by force and arms taken their grain raised upon their farms and hauled it away and sold it for such price as suited them, and turned the money back to the farmer, and snapped their fingers in his face.

When you grant power these days be sure that it will be exercised, and the smaller the individual is to whom you grant the power the more he will abuse it. Starting even so low as the Food Administrator in Washington and running thence to the county food administrators, you will find more petty tyranny than was ever exercised by a Roman emperor in the days when Rome's bloody record was written by the hand of tyranny.

Here is a bill which proposes to authorize any one of the gentlemen named to go to any concern in Washington and demand the books. There is no limit upon the power. A bank that employs a woman clerk. Under this bill any one of these little fellows who is appointed—and he will be little; it takes a little man to hold a job like that. You can always tell the stature of some men by the job they have. A fellow who is employed as a detective, whose business it is to look through keyholes and peek under window blinds, is always a crook, because nobody but a crook ever took a job of that kind.

He will have laid aside all the elements of a man before he will ever do that sort of work. Likewise a man who will take a job on one of these Washington boards and interfere with other people's business can not be a very big man. Therefore I say one of these little men could go down to a bank employing a woman clerk and demand the books of that bank. Let us see where the power stops:

To examine, through any member or authorized representative, any book, pay roll, or other record of any employer of women or minors that in any way appertains to or has a bearing upon the question of wages of any such women or minors.

It has been suggested to me whether this would not apply to women who are Government employees. I do not see why it should not. But notice, any one of the members of this board can invade this bank, or anybody they appoint can do it. They can designate any agent they see fit. It might be very convenient for one business house to have one of its employees designated to investigate the books of another business house. Anybody can go and examine the books who is designated by this board.

Any agent of this board, any representative of this board whom they may appoint and clothe with the purple of their authority and anoint with the oil of their greatness can do this. He can—

Require from such employer full and true statements of the wages paid to all women and minors in his employment.

Every employer shall keep a register of the names of the women and minors employed by him in any occupation in the District of Columbia, of the hours worked by each, and of all payments made to each, whether paid by the time or by the piece; and shall, on request, permit any member or authorized representative of the board to examine such register.

Just what can the board do? It can establish—standards of minimum wages for women in any occupation within the District of Columbia.

Will this board also establish a standard of capacity? Wages are paid for capacity of production. Will you fix a standard of capacity of production? Such a provision as this is as unwise and as foolish as it would be to fix a standard price that shall be paid for any horses, whereas one horse is a spavined, worthless, aged, dying animal, whose possession is a liability, while another can outrun the winged wind and is worth $100,000. Any man who sought to fix a single price for all horses would be able to qualify as a member of the board that determined upon a single engine for all kinds of aeroplanes. But we are to fix a standard wage that is to be paid for a day's labor for a woman.

I will go back to the question of the stenographer, because that is an occupation in which so many women are splendidly employed. There is not a man in this room who has not had occasion to employ in the course of his life many stenographers. There is not a man here who does not know that the difference between stenographers is as great as the difference between the two horses I used in my illustration. One of them can not take what you dictate; she can not write it correctly; she can not spell the words; she can not punctuate. Some of them are so bad that if you turn over to them a new typewriter they will speedily derange it so that it will not spell correctly, no matter who operates it. There are others who can take anything that can be dictated by any man as rapidly as required, who will turn it out with marvelous speed and hand it to their employer in the shape of a document that is complete and perfect. One of these women is worth less than nothing and the other is worth just as much as you can afford to pay.

This bill, however, will fix a standard. Where is it going to be fixed? If you fix it at $50, I know plenty of stenographers who are not worth it; if you fix it at $25 I know some of them that are not worth it; and yet I know of many who were not worth $50 two or three years ago, who obtained positions at a very small wage, and who worked along until they became proficient. That kind of a stenographer will never get a job after you fix a standard, for the standard will be fixed too high, and she will have to go somewhere else to learn how to work.

But the car of moral progress must go on just the same, and reform must not be stopped. Let us say you are going to fix a standard price for a bookkeeper. What an imbecilic proposition that would be!

Here is a small grocery store that keeps a little single-entry book of sales, and yet requires somebody to do it. A boy or a girl, 14 or 15 years of age, during vacation from school may be able to keep those accounts; to put down Mary Jones, so many pounds of sugar, 50 cents, and so forth; and to make out the little simple bills for that business. Here is a lady who keeps the books of some great manufacturing concern or who keeps the books for some great countinghouse. She has to possess the skill of an expert accountant, and does possess it. She is worth a salary of $4,000 or $5,000 a year. What good is the standard price in a case of that kind? If you fix it high enough to do any good to any considerable number, you will shut out the bookkeeper in the small grocery store—I am speaking of the small grocery store—and that small mechant will keep his own books. If you fix it so low as to include that class of em-employees you will do no good, for you will effect nothing.

We are going to have a standard price fixed, I suppose, for chauffeurs, and yet one of them may be worth $200 a month under certain conditions, and another one will break up your machine and actually raise the rate of life and accident insurance. What are you going to fix as the standard of chauffeurs? Here is one man who is a mechanic, who knows your machine, who knows how to preserve it. Here is another fellow who is a bungler, who knows just enough to get a job in an emergency. How are you going to classify those two men?

Shall we talk of seamstresses? That is a far-away subject that we only come in contact with once in a while when we are required to observe a dressmaker's bill contracted by our wives, and yet we know that there is everything from the girl who can barely run a seam to a woman who is in fact almost an artist. One of them is worth but two or three or four dollars a week, because she is barely learning and produces practically nothing, while the other is able to draw and is receiving, perhaps, in some great department house, five or six thousand dollars a year salary. Where are you going to fix a standard in cases of that sort? I do not care where you go, you will find this difference.

There are no farms in the District of Columbia that amount to anything; but, if there were and one wanted to hire corn huskers, I can find you plenty of big, husky, able-bodied men who could not husk 30 bushels of corn a day to save their lives, if you had a yield of a hundred bushels an acre, while I can find you others who will put from 75 to 80 bushels in the wagon in a day. Where is your standard for that?

You might fix a price for piecework, but how are you going to fix a standard for men when God Almighty made men of as many different standards and patterns as there are leaves upon the forest trees. If the Lord would only standardize men and women, then you could standardize wages. If you could standardize capacity, legislation of this kind would not be so ridiculous; but here is one man with the strength of a giant and the soul of a coward, while here is another man with the strength of a woman and the soul of a Cæsar. How are you going to standardize those two men? One of them would plan a battle, would mobilize an army, would take a citadel, would conquer a country, would establish a dynasty or liberate a world, while the other would find a stone fence to hide behind, and would crawl away like a craven. How are you going to standardize creatures like that when Almighty God, instead of standardizing them, made them in the mills of infinitude and gave to each his own peculiar powers and capacities and frailties?

There are no standards for men and women. You can not tell, to save your life, as you gaze at them what they are good for, what they will accomplish. Here is a woman with the face of a saint and the heart of a fiend; here is another, of sour visage, who will sacrifice her life in the service of her race. Here is a man who, so far as outward appearance is concerned, is favored by nature, powerful and apparently intelligent, and yet the acme of his performance is the adjustment of a cravat or the brushing of a pair of artistic whiskers. Here is another, little, insignificant-looking fellow, who moves worlds. How will you standardize men and standardize women?

You can not even standardize bolsheviki; even they have their varieties. There is only one thing common to them all. They are the apostles of change; they are the high priests who stand in the temple of fortune and burn incense to the god of chance. They sacrifice on the altars of experimentation. They are willing to try anything once; but always and forever they bear aloft in their own hands a banner proclaiming themselves the leaders of reform, the champions of humanity, the saviors of their race!

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thomas
Brandegee	Kendrick	Poindexter	Thompson
Calder	Kenyon	Pomerene	Trammell
Chamberlain	Kirby	Ransdell	Underwood
Cummins	Knox	Reed	Vardaman
Curtis	McCumber	Robinson	Wadsworth
Dillingham	McKellar	Shafroth	Walsh
Drew	McNary	Sheppard	Warren
France	Martin	Shields	Watson
Guion	Nelson	Simmons	Wilfley
Hale	New	Smith, Ga.
Harding	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smoot

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. During that absence I am paired with him. I do not know how he would vote on this measure, so I will have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I inquire whether the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois, which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WALSH. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I therefore transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from West Virgina [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 36, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Borah	Harding	McKellar	Shafroth
Brandegee	Henderson	McNary	Sheppard
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Sherman
Chamberlain	Kendrick	New	Shields
Cummins	Kenyon	Norris	Sterling
Curtis	Kirby	Nugent	Thompson
Dillingham	Knox	Poindexter	Townsend
Drew	Lodge	Pomerene	Trammell
Hale	McCumber	Robinson	Walsh

NAYS—12.

Bankhead	Martin	Smith, Ga.	Underwood
France	Overman	Smith, S. C.	Wadsworth
Guion	Reed	Thomas	Wilfley

NOT VOTING—47.

Ashurst	Gore	Lewis	Smith, Md.
Baird	Gronna	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Hardwick	Myers	Smoot
Benet	Hitchcock	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Hollis	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Penrose	Vardaman
Fall	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Warren
Fernald	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Watson
Fletcher	Kellogg	Ransdell	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	King	Saulsbury	Williams
Gerry	La Follette	Simmons	Wolcott
Goff	Lenroot	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the passage of the bill the yeas are 36 and the nays are 12. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] are present and paired. A majority having voted in favor of the bill, the bill is passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock meridian on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate September 13, 1918.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 13, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, continue Thy mercies unto us, the denizens of this old world, provided with all things necessary to life, happiness, and peace; now turned into a seething, boiling caldron, destructive of life, truth, and justice; which has turned men from the peaceful pursuits of life into a war of hate and revenge on the one hand and on the other the defense of all that true men hold dear.

Continue to sustain, uphold, and guide those who are battling for the right that all things shall be adjusted to the normal and peace and happiness reign supreme. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROPOSED PRESENTATION OF SEVRES VASES BY FRANCE (S. DOC. NO. 276).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request of the French Ambassador I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a letter from the ambassador expressing the desire of his Government to offer to each of the two Houses of Congress a vase from the National Manufacture of Sevres.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 11 September, 1918.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the ambassador's letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMBASSADE DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE
AUX ÉTATS-UNIS,
Washington, le September 9, 1918.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Anxious to show their profound appreciation of the way in which Congress received the Viviani-Joffre Mission when it came to express France's sisterly gratitude for America's timely help, my Government is desirous, if so allowed, to offer to each of the two Houses a vase from our National Manufacture of Sevres.

Our hope is that those products of French craftsmanship may be kindly accepted and preserved as a token of what France feels toward the representatives of the American States and citizens, whose manly resolutions, suggested by yourself, each of them meeting the country's warmest approval, will have had such a decisive influence on the severest conflict, and the greatest by its consequences, the world has ever known.

I should be very much obliged to you if you were so good as to inform the Senate and the House of Representatives of the intention of the Government of the French Republic and of its motives.

I have the honor to be, dear Mr. President,
Very respectfully and sincerely, yours,

JUSSERAND.

The SPEAKER. This message with the accompanying letter will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that that properly ought to go to the Committee on the Library. I suppose the Speaker has given full thought to it.

Mr. WALSH. Ought it not to go to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. Of course whichever committee it is referred to will give it proper consideration, but it seems to the Chair that it properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is a communication from a foreign Government to our Government. We will let it go to that committee, unless the gentleman wants to discuss the authorities about it.

PROTECTION OF TRADE-MARKS AND COMMERCIAL NAMES.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of Senate bill 4889, and will make a statement so that my request will be understood. The Department of Commerce sent both to the Senate and the House and asked to have passed a bill to give effect to certain provisions of the Convention for the Protection of Trade-Marks and Commercial Names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

In the Senate this bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and in the House to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have been considering this bill and have had quite a lot of correspondence concerning it. On September 12 the Senate passed the bill and sent it over to the House, and it has been referred to the Committee on Patents. While the Committee on Patents, and also the Committee on Foreign Affairs, may have jurisdiction, as well as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, we have had the similar House bill under consideration ever since the 1st day of May and have made quite a little progress. I believe it would be in the interest of good legislation to have the Senate bill on the subject, which is the same bill, referred to the same committee.

The SPEAKER. Was the House bill referred to that committee?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and it has been considered by the committee ever since the 1st day of May.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman authority from his committee to make this request?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. I had it up before the committee this morning and was authorized to take the course I am taking in the matter of a change of reference.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman talked with the chairman of the Committee on Patents [Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH] about this matter?

Mr. SIMS. I have not.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman think he ought to speak to him about the matter before bringing it up in the House? Would not that be proper courtesy?

Mr. SIMS. His committee has not been considering the bill.

Mr. GARNER. It seems to me it would be a matter of proper courtesy for the chairman of one committee to consult with the chairman of the other committee before asking to take away from his committee a bill which has been referred to it.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know that the chairman of the Committee on Patents was not present. I supposed he was here and listening to my remarks.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, whatever it is going to be.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and that is the end of it.

The Chair desires to state that the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is a very proper one. In all these controversies about jurisdiction over bills, which are frequent, the chairmen of the committees interested ought to consult with each other before bringing the matter before the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DEWALT (at the request of Mr. STEELE), until Tuesday next, on account of important business; and

To Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, indefinitely, on account of illness.

LIBERTY BONDS.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 12923 to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, with Mr. SLAYDEN in the chair.

On taking the chair Mr. SLAYDEN was greeted with applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of House bill 12923, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the campaign for the fourth liberty loan will begin on September 28. While not definitely settled, the amount of bonds to be offered for sale will probably be around $6,000,000,000. In view of many circumstances and conditions, among which is the probable large increase in the amount of taxes, and especially surtaxes, it is thought by the Treasury Department and by the committee necessary to exempt from surtaxes a certain amount of bonds, and to make certain other amendments to existing statutes. This bill proposes to do that.

The first provision of the bill, which is the main provision, proposes to exempt the interest on fourth liberty bonds the principal of which does not exceed $30,000, owned by any person, partnership, corporation, or association, from surtaxes, excess-profit taxes, and war-profit taxes. The interest from all liberty bonds is already exempt from normal income taxes and the corporation income tax.

The bill also provides that a person buying fourth liberty bonds can have an exemption of the first liberty bonds converted, and the second liberty bonds converted and unconverted, and third liberty bonds to the extent of one and one-half times as much as the amount of fourth liberty bonds subscribed for and owned by such person at the date of his tax return, not to exceed in the aggregate in any event $45,000.

In other words, if a person buys $10,000 of the fourth liberty bonds—of course they will be exempt because all up to $30,000 of the purchase are exempt—he can have an exemption of the first liberty bonds converted or the second or the third liberty bonds to the amount of $15,000, because that is one and one-half times as much as the bonds he purchases. In other words, if he had $45,000 of the first liberty bonds converted and the second and third liberty bonds, and he purchased $30,000 of new bonds, the new bonds would be exempt from surtaxes, excess-profits and war-profits taxes, and the fact that he subscribed for and owns the $30,000 of fourth liberty bonds at the time of his tax return will entitle him to hold the $45,000 of converted first liberty bonds and second and third liberty bonds free from the like taxes also.

But if he owns $50,000 of the first liberty bonds converted and the second and third bonds and bought $30,000 of the new bonds, the new bonds would be exempt and not exceeding $45,000 of the old bonds, because the bill provides that you can not have an exemption of more than $45,000 of the old bonds.

Mr. GILLETT. Would the gentleman prefer to make his statement before any questions are asked?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would prefer that, and I will request gentlemen to reserve their questions until I get through. This exemption lasts only two years after the termination of the war, the date to be fixed by the President. It is presumed that within at least two years after the expiration of the war the surtax will be greatly reduced and therefore will compensate for the loss of the exemption.

If a man buys no new bonds and he owns old bonds, he will get no exemption on account of ownership of the old bonds. This was inserted as an inducement for people who own old bonds to buy new bonds, because he will get an exemption of the new bonds and the old bonds.

I myself, if I had the responsibility of selling these bonds, and I think if a majority of the committee had the responsibility of selling the bonds, we would make the exemption, say, $25,000, and have no limit as to the time, making them absolutely exempt, as $5,000 of bonds now are absolutely exempt. But we discussed this matter with the Treasury Department, and it, having the responsibility for selling the bonds, preferred to have this limit of exemption for two years after the war.

Now, we have a provision that the 3½ per cent bonds that are converted into the new bonds shall also have an exemption of $30,000. That is, if the owner of 3½ per cent bonds, which are totally exempted from the tax, shall convert them into the new bonds, he can have the same exemption of $30,000. These exemptions are in addition to the $5,000 flat exemption from all taxes now in the present law, and inherently in all the liberty bonds we have heretofore issued.

In section 2 we increase the amount of war-saving certificates that can be issued from $2,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000. The Treasury Department thought it was wise to increase the war-saving certificates from $2,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000, because the necessary distribution of the war-savings stamps among thousands of post offices and other agencies engaged in making sales over the counter may make the present limit very embarrassing long before the cash receipts of the Treasury indicate that the limit is about to be reached.

Section 3 permits the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit war-profits taxes in designated depositaries throughout the United States. The other liberty-bond act permitted him to deposit income taxes and excess-profits taxes in such depositaries to help the local taxpayers by keeping the money from being taken away from the local community in which the taxes are paid. We had no war-profits taxes at that time of the enactment of the prior bond acts, so there has been no need for this authority prior to this time. The pending revenue bill provides for the levy of a war-profits tax, and therefore it becomes necessary to provide this authority for the deposit of war-profits taxes.

Section 4 gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to make arrangements in or with foreign countries to stabilize the foreign exchanges and to obtain foreign currencies and credits in such currencies, and he may use any such credits and foreign currencies for the purpose of stabilizing or rectifying foreign exchanges, and he may designate depositaries in foreign countries with which may be deposited, as he may determine, all or any part of the avails of any foreign credits or foreign currencies.

This provision is for the purpose of stabilizing the exchanges or bringing up the American dollar to par in cases where it is now at a discount, and it is at a discount, in common language, in practically all of the countries, or many of the countries, which export to this country more than we export them. It is really just the difference between the exchange, but it is so large now that the American dollar, generally speaking, is at a discount. For instance, in Argentina the discount is about 5 per cent; in Spain, about 16 per cent. It is the opinion of the Treasury Department that this provision will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to bring the dollar considerably higher, perhaps to par, and it also enables the Treasury to get currencies in the countries in which our industries are trading and also to supply the needs of the American Expeditionary Forces. For instance, we have to buy in foreign countries for our forces abroad a great many articles, and this provision is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to buy their currency and deposit it in banks or wherever the Secretary may decide to place it, and to make payment in that currency. There is no limit, you will notice. Of course, the Secretary would have the legal power to obligate the Government in billions of dollars, without any limit or limit of interest, but in order to place a limit we want to know how to limit, whether ten, twenty, thirty, or one hundred millions, or a billion or two billions. This is one of the matters that we must leave in the wise discretion of the Secretary.

Section 5 amends the act known as the trading-with-the-enemy act by giving the President power to regulate, investigate, or prohibit the sale of bonds and certificates of indebtedness and the melting and hoarding of gold. The other provisions in section 5 are now in the present act. That, of course, is a pretty broad power to be given to any one person, for the reason that the President can simply issue an order that a bond owner can not sell his bond under any circumstances to anyone, but must keep it. Of course, that is the power that he would have, but the exercise of that power, of course, is not in contemplation.

There are a great many merchants or traders who offer an inducement for people to sell their bonds to them, and who advertise their goods to be sold at lower prices and to be paid for in bonds—that they will give them more for bonds in that way than they can get on the market. It tempts a person to buy that which he does not need and to part with his bonds. I apprehend that under this provision some regulation might be made with reference to such bond transactions. This provision is a very necessary power that the President should have to assist in keeping the bonds stabilized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask the gentleman to make a note of it and permit me to get through the explanation of the bill, for I shall be through in 10 minutes, and then I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman. I think that everyone will admit that something has got to be done to prevent the sale of these bonds in a great many instances. A great many manipulators can get together and put down the price of bonds on the market, if they want to, and then get some means by which to buy the bonds in at a low price.

Section 6 extends the power of national banks to loan money. Under the existing law a national bank can only loan to one person, firm, or corporation an amount not to exceed 10 per cent of its capital stock and surplus. We add this, that in addition to this power the bank can discount notes or loan money upon notes secured by a like amount of United States liberty bonds issued since April 24, 1917, to the amount of 10 per cent of its capital stock and surplus. National banks already have the power to loan to any person, partnership, corporation, or association on any kind of good security an amount equal to 10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus. That authority remains as it is. In addition to that, we provide that the national banks can loan any one firm, individual, corporation, or association an amount equal to 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of the bank, provided the loan is secured by liberty bonds issued since April 24, 1917, and, in addition to that, under such rules and regulations as the comptroller, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, they can increase that limit of 10 per cent loaned on liberty bonds to 20 or 30 per cent. This is thought to be a very wise provision, in order to enable people who desire to buy bonds to borrow upon those bonds. A person may have already borrowed to his limit, as a great many of us have, and yet want to buy bonds and want to borrow some more money from the same bank. This provision will enable us to borrow as much as 10 per cent in addition, if they desire to loan it to us.

Mr. FOSTER. Limiting it to the 10 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; except, as I say, the comptroller, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe rules where they may loan more than 10 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the gentleman to say up to 30 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. They have a right without the consent of any rules prescribed by the comptroller, with the approval of the Secretary, to get this additional 10 per cent on liberty bonds. But the comptroller, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, can make rules by which to increase even that limit of 10 per cent on liberty bonds.

Mr. FOSTER. So that they might get more than 20 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; they can get 10 per cent under the existing law and they get another 10 per cent under this bill without consulting the Treasury Department, but if the department deems it advisable to let one have more than the additional 10 per cent they can make it any amount they prefer.

Mr. FOSTER. They can give permission to loan more?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; under the rules that they prescribe. I think, gentlemen, this concludes my explanation of the bill. Now I will be glad to yield to any gentleman who desires to ask any questions.

Mr. McFADDEN. To make a little clearer the gentleman's statement, suppose a man is a holder of $100,000 of bonds of previous issues at this time. He buys $30,000 of the new issue. Do I understand he will have an exemption of $75,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right. He would be exempted $30,000 for the new bond, and owning $100,000 why one and one-half times 30 will make $45,000——

Mr. McFADDEN. So the total exemption would be $75,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. That is without the $5,000 exemption; so that would make $80,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. You must not get mixed up on the $5,000 exemption. The $5,000 exemption remains as it is now under existing law, and applies to all the liberty bonds except the first liberty bonds, because they are exempted from all taxation. The exemption under section 1 of this bill is in addition to the $5,000 exemption under existing law.

Mr. McFADDEN. Why should not the exemptions contained in the last paragraph, clause 3, page 3, be embodied in section 1 as to——

Mr. KITCHIN. On page 2?

Mr. McFADDEN. Page 3, where it refers specifically to the $5,000 exemption.

Mr. KITCHIN. It says, "The exemptions provided in this section shall be in addition to the $5,000 exemption."

Mr. McFADDEN. It does not apply to the fourth loan.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, to the fourth loan, in addition to all other exemptions, etc.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest that that was inserted because the $5,000 limit is for all time, and the exemption under section 1 is limited to two years after the termination of the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, that is part of the contract of all those bonds that have been issued since the first liberty bond. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state in what way the amendment to the trading-with-the-enemy act, contained in section 5 of this bill, is going to help assist in this fourth liberty loan?

Mr. KITCHIN. Giving the President power to investigate, regulate, or prohibit the sale of bonds and certificates of indebtedness to the United States, and the melting and hoarding of gold and silver. That is the only provision in this section that is added to existing law; the remainder of the section is in existing law, but it is thought that the President by having that power, and wisely exercising it, it will be able to increase the value of the bonds, which I understand are now selling around 95 per cent.

If there is any way by which we can raise that 95 per cent up to 98, 99, or 100, it will be more easy to sell future bonds at par. I think, as I said awhile ago, there are a great many transactions that are legitimate but are not exactly right and expedient at this time with respect to dealing in United States bonds, and this provision gives the President the power to regulate or prohibit such transactions. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. That clause of the bill of which the gentleman is just now speaking will give the President power to prohibit absolutely the transfer of bonds on the market?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I heard even last year that the German Government had exercised that power and had forbidden the sale of Government bonds on the market for the purpose of concealing from their own people and from the world the depreciated condition of German securities. Are we going to do exactly what the German Government is doing in that respect?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no idea the President of the United States will exercise the power given him in such a way. Undoubtedly he has that power under this section.

Mr. DENISON. What is the use of giving it? We are following the German Goverment in a great many respects, especially in a military way, and I was just wondering whether we are now by this legislation following their financial policy by authorizing the President primarily to stop trading on the stock exchanges in the bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Section 5 gives the President power to prevent any holder of bonds from selling them, but it is not assumed or presumed, and it would be a very rash presumption for any person to make, that the President is going to exercise that power, but how are you going to limit it? I will tell you.

The President, under the power we provide as Commander in Chief of the Army, and with the complete power we have given him, can start across from these shores a million men in simple canoes, with paddles for each man, and say, "Go across." He has that power, and they must go or attempt to go. I have no idea that the President ever would exercise that kind of a power. The President has really the power here, if we pass this bill, to do just what the gentleman says, but I have no idea the President would exercise any such power as that.

There are certain questionable classes of transactions that we want to catch. And when you think about it as much as we have as to how to catch such transactions, you will find great difficulty in drafting a proper provision to catch all the cases. We must give the President this particular power if we are going to give him any power at all with respect to the sale and transfer and dealing in Government bonds.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think that we can accomplish our purpose by giving him full power to regulate, and stop short of giving him power to completely prohibit?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think the gentleman thinks the President desires to do it. But if he desired to do it he could do it under the word "regulate" just as well as he could under the word "prohibit," because he could put such terms in his rules and regulations that would so regulate the transaction that no man could enter into such a transaction. For instance, under the power to regulate interstate commerce Congress can practically prohibit the manufacture of a thousand needful articles under that, but it has never exercised that power.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, it not only can, but the Supreme Court has held that it has the right to regulate it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know some things that have been actually prohibited under the terms and regulations, and it has been upheld, as the gentleman from Kentucky suggested, by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think it ever held that Congress has the right by regulation to prohibit the interstate commerce in a thing that is wholesome within itself. I never understood the Supreme Court of the United States to go that far, and it did not go that far in the child-labor case.

Mr. KITCHIN. It did that in the case of spirits.

I will put another case where we can do it, and it is a tax that a gentleman holding the views of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] can well see. We have the power to tax under the Constitution. You must admit that Congress has the right to do just what they said they could not do by this child-labor law by means of taxation. They could tax it; and there is a proposition now, I think, before the Senate—and it was suggested before our committee—to put a very high tax on all articles made by what we call child labor. I imagine the Supreme Court would sustain that as constitutional. It has sustained a great many destructive taxes as constitutional. However, I am with you on the child-labor proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that is exactly the power that Congress exercised a few years ago in the case of phosphorus matches.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Are not all the decisions they refer to under the police power to regulate things that are subject to police rules?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. They did it in the case of child labor.

Mr. LITTLE. Are not there decisions that support that theory, including child labor, apparently under the police power over things inherently subject to police control?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the Congress would give the President the absolute power to regulate, I think he could provide terms that the Supreme Court would say were reasonable terms and that would actually in effect prohibit.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that the tax exemption only applies to excess-profits taxes——

Mr. KITCHIN. Excess-profits and war-profits taxes and individual income surtaxes.

Mr. DENISON. If a corporation invests $30,000 of its profits in liberty bonds, then to that extent the income from those bonds——

Mr. KITCHIN. Is exempt.

Mr. DENISON. Does that mean that the income from the bonds would be exempt, or that amount of the income of corporations invested in the bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. The income from the bonds, the interest on the bonds, would be exempt.

Mr. DENISON. Then the $30,000 of income that is invested in the bonds would not be exempt?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Referring to section 5, the trading-with-the-enemy act, there has been considerable discussion about the word "prohibit." Will not the gentleman enumerate a few of the things that he believes the President will exercise the right to overcome?

Mr. KITCHIN. With respect to bonds?

Mr. SNYDER. With respect to bonds, and so forth.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the President will prevent the inducement of parties to sell the bonds for merchandise and things like that. We do know that large amounts of bonds have been exchanged for merchandise. For instance, a great many merchants have advertised, and you have seen it in the papers here—that they will take liberty bonds in the purchase of such and such articles, and sell the articles as cheap and, in many instances, cheaper than for cash, and even if the person buys things he needs, that kind of transaction ought to be stopped. But in most instances he will buy things he does not need, because he thinks he can get them without paying the cash. But the man generally induces him to buy the things that are not easily saleable, things that a person does not need.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. We will take a New York firm engaged in a certain line of business, and a customer in Texas buys an article from them and offers to pay for it in liberty bonds; now, as I understand, that would be a transaction in interstate commerce that Congress would have the power to regulate; but does the gentleman think that Congress would have the power to give the President the right to prohibit a transaction of that sort?

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean, rather, if Congress has got the power?

Mr. BLACK. Of course we can not delegate any more power than we possess. That is a settled fact.

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean can Congress give the President that power?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; the power to prohibit transactions of that kind.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say anyway, in war times, as a war measure, he would have the right to do it. I will say that if Congress has the power to authorize the issue of bonds—and nobody else can authorize the issue of bonds, because that is the function alone of Congress—it has the power of regulation over the things it creates, if it desires to exercise that power.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. I have an example in mind of an individual who has purchased $5,000 of the second liberty-bond issue and $5,000 of the third issue. Now, then, he has converted his second into the third issue. Is he exempt for those $10,000 worth of bonds under existing law?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not under existing law. Only as to $5,000.

Mr. WALDOW. I thought the present law provided that he would be exempted $5,000 under each issue.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; $5,000 of all the bonds.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I wish to ask if I am correct in my understanding of the first clause of the bill. It provides that these exemptions shall last until two years after the war, just as much as if it were a part of the contract, although, of course, we would have power in the next liberty loan bond sale to repeal it. Yet that would be a violation of the faith of the United States. Is that the understanding?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the understanding.

Mr. GILLETT. It is part of the contract?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir. We will sell the bonds on this condition. It may be possible that we will refer to the act in the bond.

Mr. GILLETT. You understand the United States is pledged that they shall be exempted for two years after the termination of the war?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; we are pledged to it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. In regard to section 3, touching the discount of notes secured by liberty bonds, that provision has already passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. KITCHIN. That very section was passed, I think, unanimously through the House here some time in April, and it is now pending in the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. It has been reported favorably by the Senate. I think it could be very readily passed there.

Mr. KITCHIN. It could be very readily passed if the Senate would attempt to pass it. But their attention will be called to the importance of it by putting it in this bill, because this bill must become a law before September 28. We hope it will become a law next week.

Mr. PLATT. One question further. That section prohibiting the sale of bonds, which has already been the subject of considerable discussion, it seems to me, will interfere with the sale of bonds to workingmen a good deal. It has been the small holders of these bonds who have been selling the bonds, and I may say that the experience at home has been that it is almost impossible to keep them from selling the bonds. The loss involved in their sale is very small. They are told that they are as good as cash.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think that will be interfered with. If I had a $50 bond or a $100 bond or $500 or $1,000 or $10,000, I think I could sell it. That will not be interfered with.

Mr. PLATT. I doubt if that word "prohibit" ought to be in here. It will create a bad impression.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. If the revenue bill becomes a law, will the city, county, and State bonds have the same exemption and in the same amounts as the liberty bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. They will not have the same exemption, providing we put this additional exemption in this bill. I have thought about the question.

Mr. LITTLE. Was it the intention to amend the present revenue bill now pending before the House so that it would be extended to give them the same exemption given liberty bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. We are going to consider that very proposition. I did think that probably we ought to give the State and municipal bonds the same additional exemption as is provided in this bill. Now, without considering it as carefully and as long as I should, I rather think it is better to have these additional exemptions apply only to liberty bonds. There are billions of State and county and municipal bonds now that are absolutely exempt from all tax, even under the pending revenue bill. When you consider that the large sums of State and municipal bonds already issued will be exempted from taxation, I doubt if we should add this additional exemption to that class of securities, future issues of municipal and State bonds, for new projects. If we added this exemption to the billions of State and municipal bonds that may be issued, I am of the opinion that those bonds would have a great advantage over the liberty bonds in coming into competition in the sale, because they generally carry a higher rate of interest—5, 5½, and even 6 per cent in some cases—and that high rate of interest, even with these exemptions of liberty bonds, would be a great inducement for people to buy State and municipal bonds in competition with the Government bonds.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there anything retroactive with regard to municipal bonds in the revenue bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. LITTLE. It does not go back to the old bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman for a little fuller explanation touching the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits in foreign countries; and if the gentleman will permit, I want to say that I think all of us appreciate the desirability of stabilizing American currency abroad. But I for one would like to know just to what extent, if at all, this provision authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to obligate the Federal Government outside and beyond the authorizations already made, and whether there is any limitation upon what can be done with the moneys borrowed.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman raises the very question that was raised in my mind when I first saw the suggestion from the department, and to which I referred. I do not know whether the gentleman was in the Hall or not to hear my explanation.

As the gentleman suggests, it is a very peculiar, broad power. It is unlimited, and the Secretary of the Treasury can use that power to the amount of millions or hundreds of millions of dollars, and within the letter of the provision. The power to establish credits in other countries is unlimted, and in order to establish credits in other countries we have got to obligate ourselves.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the Treasury now has a leeway running into millions and almost billions of dollars in connection with obligations of the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. The difficulty is, how shall we limit it?

Mr. SHERLEY. The question is whether the limitation might not be that to the extent that such credits are given, and shall remain as obligations against this Government, they shall be considered restrictions upon and reductions of other authorized expenditures in the way of bond issues, and so forth. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman whether any hearings were had? I have read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he states the desirability of doing this thing; but was any consideration given to the question of how pressing the necessity is, and in what way and to what extent he expected to use this power?

Mr. KITCHIN. In that letter he authorized Mr. Leffingwell, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to represent him in this matter, and we had him before our committee for three or four hours yesterday. It would take some time to read what he says about this.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to know particularly as to the second part of my question, whether when credits are created in these countries, the money placed to the credit of the United States can be expended for any other purpose than that which has been expressly authorized by law, and whether this will be considered as an authorization for expenditures irrespective of legislative enactment?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not be a bit surprised if the gentleman was considering it as I considered it, that the language of the provision gives the Secretary of the Treasury, I fear, power beyond that which the law has already authorized. The gentleman no doubt refers to the part beginning on page 4, in line 1—

> And he may use any such credits and foreign currencies for the purpose of stabilizing or rectifying the foreign exchanges.

Now, that is a pretty broad power. I think what the gentleman fears is that the Secretary of the Treasury might say, "I am doing this to stabilize or rectify foreign exchanges," because in every country there is a difference in the foreign exchange. I have the same fear that the gentleman has; but the opinion of the committee is that we have to repose considerable faith and confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, and that it might be a dangerous thing to limit him, because conditions are changing so rapidly in each of the foreign countries that it might be that the law would not give him the power he ought to have under the circumstances if we limited it.

Mr. SHERLEY. To what extent is the Government really being penalized by virtue of the depreciation of the American dollar?

Mr. KITCHIN. I mentioned two countries in which that was happening.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know; but there have been cases where these things fluctuate both ways.

Mr. KITCHIN. Surely.

Mr. SHERLEY. For instance, we are probably spending in France more money than France is now spending here.

Mr. KITCHIN. Considerably more.

Mr. SHERLEY. And you are going to see constant fluctuations in exchange.

Mr. KITCHIN. And we are spending more in Spain and in Argentina.

Mr. SHERLEY. The trouble is this: You are proposing that every time there may be a rate of exchange that is to the disadvantage of America you shall give the Treasury Department an unlimited note upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is going pretty far.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it is going very far. Perhaps some of us may think it is going too far, but here is the proposition:

We give the Secretary of the Treasury the power to make arrangements with respect to foreign exchanges, foreign currencies, "to stabilize or rectify the foreign exchanges." He may exercise wisely or sometimes unwisely the power which we give him. He can, as the gentleman from Kentucky suggests, go to the extent of obligating this Government to millions and hundreds of millions of dollars more than we propose. But in these times we have to put our faith and confidence in somebody to do these things.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. I should like to ask the gentleman whether or not the Federal Reserve Board gave the committee the benefit of their opinion on this proposition?

Mr. KITCHIN. They did not.

Mr. WINGO. The reason I ask that is that this question has been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency several times in the last 12 months. It came up on consideration of the Owen bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that.

Mr. WINGO. Gov. Harding was before our committee on another bill, and we questioned him on the Owen bill, and his statements satisfied the committee that the Owen proposition was unsound. The question was discussed in the Federal Reserve Bulletin a few months ago, and, as I recall the arguments presented, they conclusively showed that instead of the country suffering by the Spanish situation we were, if anything, benefited. The proposition that Gov. Harding discussed before our committee was one, as I now recall, quite different, yet it involves the same question, an important one, and I wanted to know whether the Federal Reserve Board had been heard on or was urging it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Leffingwell was to the contrary. They think the provision will not only be beneficial, but that it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. WINGO. As I recall the proposition, it was made for the purpose of meeting the Spanish situation. It was directly before our committee on one occasion, and we had a hearing in which the Federal Reserve Board was represented, and the arguments were so conclusive that we did not consider the Owen bill favorably. That is the reason I asked if the Federal Reserve Board was in harmony with the Secretary on this proposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should presume that the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Leffingwell conferred with the Federal Reserve Board. This provision gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to act in the way he deems best in the interest of the Government to the extent of meeting the situation. Of course, as I have suggested several times, it is a pretty large power.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Speaking for myself alone, I was largely influenced by the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury would not be parting with any property of the United States, but simply transferring credits from this country to another country.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; we are bound to get value received every time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Value received in all cases. It would simply change the place of deposit of some of our credits from this country to another country, and I do not see how there would be any possibility of any loss in the transaction.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. I wish to pursue the question asked by the gentleman from Arkansas still further, because if it is a fact that the Federal Reserve Board has had this very question up and opposed it, the mere fact that the Secretary of the Treasury—who, with all due respect, has shown a great willingness to assume power—the mere fact that he approves this grant to him of this new and prodigious power, while the Federal Board is opposed to it, would not incline me to favor it. I would like to know whether the committee considered or had the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will read the provision carefully, he will see that the legitimate objection is in the large power it gives. But I can not conceive how the Federal Reserve Board or any gentleman can think that inherently the proposition is a bad one. It seems to me a most wise one. Why should not some department or some part of the Government have this power over exchanges, the right to use the credit of the Government in the interest of not only the expeditionary force in France but countries in general to equalize as nearly as possible our dollars with their currency and bring up the exchanges to an equal basis? When you do that you bring up the exchange value of our products. A few months ago, in Spain, to use the common language, our dollar was discounted 35 per cent. It is now gone up to 16 per cent. In Switzerland it was at about 14 per cent discount. We have equalized that; we have made arrangements under the general assumption of power which was very necessary; we have equalized our dollar in currency. We have to buy in Switzerland a great many things absolutely necessary for the expeditionary force.

Take Spain, for instance. We imported during the fiscal year 1917 $37,000,000 worth of goods—a pretty good sum in Spain's favor. From Argentina we imported $153,000,000, mainly in hides and wool. We want to equalize the dollar of the currency of the two countries.

This provision authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow or buy or deposit there what our balance would be in that currency. We are importing a great many things from that country which we must use in the production of articles absolutely necessary to the war and to perform a great many Government contracts.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think the gentleman got what I said. This is a different proposal to the Owen bill, though covering the same question.

As I now recall, gentlemen came before us complaining of the Spanish situation; they were importers of olive oil, and one of them lived in Baltimore. In addition to the answers Gov. Harding made to our inquiries, this whole question was discussed in the March issue of the Federal Reserve Bulletin. This article disclosed the fact that we were selling more goods to Spain than we were buying from her, and, considering all factors, the American exporter could buy with his product a larger quantity of Spanish products than ever before. If we settled in cash, the situation would be different, but the trade balance is in our favor.

Gov. Harding's answers to our questions convinced me, and that article in the Federal Reserve Bulletin convinced me, that the transactions then going on were to the advantage commercially of the United States, and that the only persons hurt were the importers of olive oil.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the position that Gov. Harding takes, and at that time our dollar was at a discount of over 30 per cent. I can not conceive how it could do anything but benefit this country to have our dollar the equal in standard of their pesetos and to have it at par rather than at a discount. For instance, in order to get $650,000 worth of olive oil from Spain it takes $1,000,000 of American money. If it takes $1,000,000 of American money to buy it there, when it gets here our consumers must pay the additional $350,000 on account of the difference in the two standards. I can not understand Gov. Harding's reason for it.

Mr. WHEELER. Does it not enable the cotton planters to perhaps realize 16 cents more for their cotton in Spain?

Mr. KITCHIN. Sixteen cents less. Of course, if they are going to just trade articles, it would be equal, but it will take that much more cotton. If we are going to sell our cotton there and buy olive oil, it will take $1,000,000 worth of cotton to buy $650,000 worth of olive oil. We do not sell much cotton to Spain, however.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There is another item the gentleman has not mentioned which is important, and that is that our purchases for military purposes in Spain are vastly more than the commerce to which the gentleman has referred, and all that is taken into consideration.

Mr. KITCHIN. Absolutely. I gave Switzerland as an example. We have had to buy a great many million dollars' worth of goods there, and we had to equalize the value of currencies, and they think what they have done in Switzerland they can do in these other countries. They may not be able to do it. Let us read again and see what we do:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may make arrangements—

Whoever the Secretary may be, if he is a wise, able, patriotic American, there is not going to be much danger to American interests or the American people—

That the Secretary of the Treasury may make arrangements in or with foreign countries to stabilize the foreign exchanges—

Do we not want that done? Would that not be in the interest of this Government? Would it not be in the interest of our expeditionary forces and of the people of the United States for that to be done? No one disputes that—and to obtain foreign currencies and credits in such currencies—

Is that not only wise and proper, but is it not necessary for us to do that?

and he may use—

Here is where he may use the power, and he may fool us and say that he used the power to stabilize or rectify the exchanges when, as a matter of fact, he really has some other motive; but no real, wise, patriotic Secretary is going to do that—

and he may use any such credits and foreign currencies for the purpose of stabilizing or rectifying the foreign exchanges—

Is not that wise and proper and is not that necessary? Of course, when they give any man power, inherently there goes with that power the possibility of the abuse of it; but we must impose confidence in somebody to do that which is necessary and wise—and he may designate depositories in foreign countries, with which may be deposited, as he may determine, all or any part of the avails of any foreign credits or foreign currencies.

If we are going to give him that power, he has to have somewhere to deposit the funds, so that provision can not be objectionable. I can see how any power that we give to anyone under these conditions during the war may be abused, but I can not conceive any great danger in this provision, provided we have confidence in whoever is or whoever may be Secretary of the Treasury. I entertained the fear that gentlemen are entertaining, and I said in my explanation that it was a pretty big power to grant, but we have to lodge the power somewhere.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask about clause 2 on page 2. As I read that clause, in order for the holder of liberty bonds of the first, converted, and the second and third liberty loans to take advantage of this tax exemption he must be an original subscriber to the fourth liberty loan?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Will that not have the effect of making the market for the fourth liberty loan very largely among those men who are now holders of the bonds described here and who are buying them for the purpose of avoiding a certain amount of income tax which they would otherwise have to pay? Will it not have an automatic effect of reducing the income now collected or which may be collected from that source?

Mr. KITCHIN. The purpose of the provision is to widen the market for the fourth liberty bonds—that is, to give people an inducement to buy those bonds. In other words, say, a gentleman has $45,000 worth of these second liberty bonds and third liberty bonds and converted first liberty bonds. He may say, "I have bonds enough," but we can offer him the inducement, if he buys some of these liberty bonds, of exemption to the amount of $45,000 of the bonds he already holds and $30,000 of the fourth liberty bonds, and he is likely to go out and buy them.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman says it will widen the market. I want to ask the gentleman whether it would not almost narrow the market, because the gentleman knows that a great many of these bonds which are subject to the tax have gotten into the hands of the larger holders. Now, in that case they are subject to this high surtax we are putting on here. We are telling these holders of the earlier bonds that if they will buy a certain number of the fourth liberty loan bonds they shall have exemption on 150 per cent of that amount on the bonds they now own. Now, the smaller holder, the little fellow, would not pay any surtax, not any tax perhaps on liberty loan bonds, having less than $5,000. He finds the market on the fourth liberty loan bonds is not widened because he can not sell his fourth liberty loan bonds any better on account of this tax exemption than before.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course he can.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose he subscribes to the fourth liberty loan bond. It is not going to widen his market because he can not sell any better on account of it, not any better than the man who gets the tax exemption, the original subscriber to the same issue.

Mr. KITCHIN. This additional exemption can offer no inducement to the man who is never going to pay any surtax. Suppose here is a man whose income is not over $5,000 with the interest that he is getting on the bonds. It is no inducement for him to buy. He has already got all the inducements the law can possibly give him in paying no tax at all, because the bonds he will buy will not be subject to the normal tax and will not be subject to any surtax; hence his income altogether, with the interest on these bonds, is not enough to come in the surtax class. He is not paying an excess or war profits tax; therefore this can not be an inducement to that man. He has as much inducement to buy now as he had to buy any of the other bonds. This is an inducement to the man whose income is in the surtax class. In other words, if we had no surtax, or possibly if we did not increase the surtax at all, section 1 would not be in this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. If the exemption were to apply to all holders of the earlier issues of bonds up to the amount of the fourth liberty loan that they own, would not that broaden the market of the small holder of the fourth liberty loan bonds and make these bonds sell nearer par? The owner would be able to sell to anybody who wanted to accumulate $30,000 for the purpose of a tax exemption on an earlier issue.

Mr. KITCHIN. Your proposition is to strike out "subscribed." Then we would have no inducement for this other man to buy. We want him to subscribe. In fact, a man gets no exemption on the old bonds unless he is a subscriber to these bonds, and that is to induce him to become a subscriber; and if you subscribe to these bonds you can have one and a half times the amount you subscribe for exempted if you still own the bond at the date of your tax return.

Mr. SNYDER. Even then you are only in the same position as the man who owns $5,000 to the extent of the $30,000 purchase?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me put a concrete case to the gentleman: Suppose you approach a man to buy the fourth liberty-loan bonds. He is a small holder. You ask him to buy a small lot, and he says, "What is to prevent these bonds going below par? How do I know when I need to sell the bonds I can get par for them?" What can you say to him? You can not say, "You have a market for these bonds because certain people will want them to accumulate a surplus against their surtax," because he has not that market. What market is he going to have for the 4¼ per cent bonds of this fourth loan? He has got little or none.

Mr. KITCHIN. It can not narrow the market.

Mr. BORLAND. It must.

Mr. KITCHIN. It would be just the same market, the same market that he had for the other bonds. If we would do what the gentleman suggests to do, strike out the word "subscribed" in line 16, page 2, strike out "subscribed for by such owner and still owned," gentlemen, then the $45,000 exemption provision would not be of any use. This is an inducement for the man who owns liberty bonds to subscribe for the fourth liberty bonds.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the only inducement, and it does not furnish a market for the bonds in the hands of the little fellow.

Mr. KITCHIN. It does not furnish an additional market.

Mr. BORLAND. That is what it is intended to do.

Mr. PLATT. Is one not allowed to sell to the fellow that subscribes to the $30,000 of new bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. A man must originally subscribe for the fourth liberty bond before he can take advantage of paragraph 2—that is, have any exemption on account of ownership of the old bonds. Otherwise let us see what it would mean. Then the man who owns the old bonds and whose income is in the surtax class would not buy the fourth liberty bonds and he would induce me to buy, so that he could buy from me, and then claim the bond he bought from me as a part of the exemption and get the exemption.

Mr. BORLAND. It seemed to me it was confining the markets of these bonds to the holders of the original bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. SNYDER. It is not the intention of this act to make a market for the man who now holds bonds, but to make a market for the Government to sell its bonds. It would not help the fellow who already has his bonds to sell his bonds. We prefer he would not sell.

Mr. GLASS. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I would like to call attention to a matter that has already been discussed. One of my colleagues on the Banking and Currency Committee has directed my attention to section 4 of this bill, which I have just seen. And while I am not a stickler for committee jurisdiction, I want to submit to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means the question as to whether or not this is not an invasion of the proper jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee, and if he thinks that this is the way to legislate upon important and serious banking matters?

The chairman of the committee did call my attention to section 6 of the bill, which proposes to amend section 5200 of the national-bank act, and I made no objection to it, for the reason that the Banking and Currency Committee of the House last April reported, and this House passed with practical unanimity, this very provision in toto, without any alteration whatsoever. It was passed on the 3d of last April. It seems to me the orderly process would have been for the Treasury Department to have insisted that the other legislative branch of the Government take note of the fact and pass the bill over there. It is here brought in as a rider on a bond bill.

I say that I do not object to it, because we have already passed upon it—both the Banking and Currency Committee and the House. It was unanimously reported and practically unanimously passed. But here is another matter that was not called to my attention until just now. And I will say to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, while I shall make no objection to it, because I do not know enough about it and he does not know enough about it, and the House will not know enough about it, to know whether it is the correct procedure or not and the wise thing to do——

Mr. KITCHIN. We have discussed that for about half an hour, and I myself doubt whether anybody knows the wisest thing to do.

Mr. GLASS. We have discussed it in the committee for about half a week, and we do not know much about it now. But I will say to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that it simply tends to bring about confusion and a division of authority, and I know it is not a wise thing to do in this way, and I am not prepared to say that it is a wise thing to do at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why does not the gentleman then make a point of order against the bill and have it considered by the committee?

Mr. GLASS. I do not intend to do that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. To what provision does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GLASS. To section 4 of the bill, that relates to the stabilization of foreign exchange.

Now, the Banking and Currency Committee of the House have very carefully considered the question of foreign exchange and foreign banking generally, and have had members of the Federal Reserve Board before the committee and have discussed the matter with them rather exhaustively, and upon the recommendation of the Federal Reserve Board the committee unanimously recommended an alteration in the Federal reserve act 12 months ago which authorized the Federal Reserve Board to compel the Federal reserve bank, in its discretion, to establish foreign connections with the view of taking care of foreign exchange. The contention was that the Federal reserve bank management had shown a disinclination to take care of this phase of banking, because of an indisposition to come in competition with the great banks of the country, members of the Federal Reserve System, and therefore it was contended if the Federal reserve bank managements were unwilling to act upon the permissibility of the law to carry out the spirit of the law, to establish foreign connections, and stabilize foreign exchange, we would give the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington ample authority to compel them to do it; and we did amend the act authorizing the Federal Reserve Board, in its discretion, to permit or compel the Federal reserve banks to establish foreign connections in order to stabilize foreign exchange. The Federal Reserve Board has not chosen to exercise that authority for reasons that may or may not be satisfactory. Sometimes I think it has not been done because the board itself is disinclined to come in competition with the big banks of the country. It may be said, on the contrary, that members of the board think it unwise to do it at this particular time because of complications that involve our allies. At any rate, the foreign exchange is in bad shape.

But it seems to me that legislation of this sort ought to take its usual and regular course and be carefully considered by those of us who are charged under the rules of the House with the consideration of complicated questions of this sort. Now, I am not going to raise the point of order against this. I am not prepared to say that it is unwise legislation, but it is unwise to be legislating in this way.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that I am in full sympathy with his views——

Mr. GLASS. I may add this thought, that this clause gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to practically establish foreign connections and to stabilize foreign exchange and to make deposits with these foreign banking institutions necessary to accomplish this. And yet the Federal reserve act now vests this authority distinctively with the Federal Reserve Board, so that you are confusing the matter and dividing responsibility and authority.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said to the gentleman, I fully sympathize with him with respect to the committees operating within their jurisdiction and not taking jurisdiction of subjects of which their committees have no jurisdiction. And when bills have come before our committee, and especially bills coming to us from the different departments, I have been very careful heretofore in going over the bills to see what matters in the bill other committees have jurisdiction over.

As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] knows and will say, I have been to him to consult him concerning several bills. This bill practically in the same form, I think—although we have clarified some propositions in it—came to us from the Secretary of the Treasury, and I went over it pretty hurriedly and noticed one proposition here, section 6, that is clearly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I made a note to see the chairman of that committee. The jurisdiction as to section 4 absolutely escaped my attention. My mind did not revert to the jurisdiction of that at all. But as to section 6 it did, and I went to see the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and told him I would strike that out if he had any objection, and he suggested to go ahead. My attention was not called, until the gentleman called it a moment ago, to the jurisdiction with respect to section 4. If I had thought about that and my attention had been called to it, I would have seen him also in regard to that.

In cases of bills before the Ways and Means Committee containing provisions within the jurisdiction of other committees of the House, it has always been my practice to confer with the chairman of the committee having jurisdiction of any particular subject matter. I remember that frequently in committee we discussed the proposition that a part of the bill should have gone to the Committee on Appropriations, and I talked with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] on the subject.

Mr. GLASS. I assent to the proposition that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means was very courteous to me.

Mr. KITCHIN. I started to say, before the gentleman made the proposition himself that it was all right to go ahead with it now, that if there was objection raised to the jurisdiction of section 4, I would move to strike it out, because our committee, of all the committees, should not assume jurisdiction that is given to other committees, because, so far as the Democrats on the committee are concerned, we originally recommend Democratic members of committees, and of course we ought not to recommend Members to membership of committees, knowing their jurisdiction, and then take it away from them.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact that in the discussions of the committee room we avoid all discussions except those that properly come before the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. I have cheerfully conceded that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and its members have been entirely courteous about matters of that sort, and I assume that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means had not had his attention brought to this particular thing. I want to say to the House that I am not willing to take the responsibility of obstructing this legislation or making a point of order to it and throwing this thing out, because it is undoubtedly true that something should be done, and done immediately, to stabilize foreign exchange. The Federal reserve bank managements have not done it. The Federal Reserve Board has not exercised the jurisdiction, with which Congress long ago clothed it, to do this, and it may be wise to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to do it if nobody else will do it. Therefore I will not take the responsibility to raise an objection. But it ought to have been sent to the Committee on Banking and Currency, because that committee clearly has jurisdiction of that subject.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not quite possible that the Federal Reserve Board, having studied the question carefully, knows that it perhaps ought not to interfere in the matter?

Mr. GLASS. It is fair to the Federal Reserve Board to say that it has studied the question carefully and has come to the conclusion repeatedly that it would greatly complicate our financial relations with our allies in the war to intervene and to do what was originally intended should be done to stabilize foreign exchange; in other words, that while it would be to the interest of a part of our business community to do that, it would be very greatly to the disadvantage of a larger part of the business community of this country to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. GLASS. And it may be that the Secretary of the Treasury can do the thing more certainly and more deftly than the Federal Reserve Board seems to have been able to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman elaborate, so that the House may be more intelligently informed, as to the information and reasons that have influenced the Federal Reserve Board in believing that this will involve our relations with the allied powers?

Mr. GLASS. I can not do that, because the Federal Reserve Board itself thought it was inexpedient to make public the reasons which relate to diplomatic considerations.

Mr. STAFFORD. In their judgment they thought this arrangement of stabilizing exchanges would result adversely to our interests in our relations with the allied governments?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and to a large part of the business community at this time. But we are now conferring authority on the Secretary of the Treasury, if he may please in his discretion, to do the very thing that the Federal Reserve Board has said may be inexpedient to do.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. HAYES. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that I do not wish to oppose this legislation. I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that it should have come from the Committee on Banking and Currency, but I think I am stating nothing that I should not state when I say that it is not the unanimous opinion of the Federal Reserve Board that there should not be some stabilizing of exchange. I think a very large minority of that board, if not a majority of it, feel that some stabilizing should take place.

Mr. GLASS. I think the Secretary of the Treasury, a member ex officio of the board, thinks it ought to be done.

Mr. HAYES. I think, from my conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury, that he believes something ought to be done, and I fully agree with him, and therefore I shall not raise the point, because I think it is legislation that ought to be passed, and that it is imperative that it should be passed.

Mr. GLASS. And I shall not raise the point either.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The foreign commerce will be stabilized as soon as we get ships enough to take care of our exports. It may be unwise to intervene, considering the fact that ships are going to be turned out speedily, so that our exports may soon resume their normal course, and the question of exchange may then take care of itself.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] states it accurately when he says that there is a division of opinion in the Federal Reserve Board on the subject. The Secretary of the Treasury thinks something effective can be done, and I am not going to take the responsibility of saying that he may not have an opportunity to do it. But I will say that I hope hereafter we will observe the orderly processes of legislation here as to committee jurisdiction.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is unwise to take things out of the hands of those who have studied them and give them into the hands of those who have not studied them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman read the paragraph in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that recommends this very strongly?

Mr. GLASS. I have not, but I know perfectly well what is the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury as to these matters. I know that he thinks something should be done, and that something can be done.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I may say that it is a surprise to the members of the Committee on Ways and Means that any question should have arisen as to the point that the Federal Reserve Board does not wish this legislation. It was submitted to us by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary, and no question was raised as to the fact that everyone connected with the Treasury wanted it.

Mr. GLASS. That simply emphasizes my contention, that the matter should have gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency, where it was known that there was a division of opinion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think so, too.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that I think he is absolutely right. That is a proper subject for the Committee on Banking and Currency to consider. Now, of course, as you all know, our committee did not initiate this bill. It was sent down to us, just as bills were sent down to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and then, if bills do not strike them as being sound or wise, they change the bills or write new ones.

Now, as to bonds, so far as our committee are concerned, we have always gladly received and considered bills drawn up by the department. As to taxation they have never undertaken to draw bills, because that is a matter that our committee assumes to initiate.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me finish, and then I will yield to the gentleman. I am very sorry that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has left the Hall, but the other members of the Banking and Currency Committee are here, and I will say that whatever transgression of rules or courtesies may have occurred has been by the Treasury Department—unintentionally, of course. I will tell you why they put this in. They put section 6 into this bill because this bill is bound to be considered before September 28 by the House and the Senate. Now, in the opinion of the Treasury Department, section 4 is absolutely urgent. That ought to have early consideration, rejection, or passage—one or the other—before September 28, and as early as possible. They have put it into this bill no doubt because this bill must be considered early by both bodies.

Section 6 is a very necessary section, increasing the right and power of national banks to loan money secured by liberty bonds. That is important. It is most important for the sale of liberty bonds. I appreciate that. Now, the Banking and Currency Committee promptly considered that very provision, section 6, reported it out of the committee, and secured its passage through this House unanimously.

Mr. HAYES. Last April.

Mr. KITCHIN. On April 3, 1918. It went to the Senate. Five months have passed, and there has been no consideration of that bill by the Senate. Now, if the Treasury Department had sent section 4 separately and alone to the Banking and Currency Committee, that committee, as it always does, would have promptly considered it, and after proper consideration, if they considered it wise, would have reported it favorably. They could have come into this House and obtained unanimous consent and have passed it promptly here. Then, suppose it had the same fate that section 6 has had in the Senate, and months and months should go by without any action by that body. No doubt the Treasury Department thought that as section 6 was very important and section 4 was very important, and needed to be considered and rejected or adopted, that if they put them in this bill, they would receive consideration before September 28. No doubt that is the reason they put them in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice that it is proposed to sell $6,000,000,000 of liberty bonds at the present time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said probably $6,000,000,000. The amount is not yet definitely fixed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The estimates for the year are $16,000,000,000, are they not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Sixteen billion dollars; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then there will have to be $10,000,000,000 more sold in the future.

Mr. KITCHIN. If they sell only $6,000,000,000 now, we will have to sell $10,000,000,000 some time during the fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before next July?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. We have authorized $22,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We have over $9,000,000,000 outstanding, have we not?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have about $10,000,000,000 outstanding, and about $12,000,000,000 authorized and available to be issued. There will have to be another authorization of bonds before the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no telling when that will be provided for?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much interested in the stabilization of our foreign exchange, but I am equally interested in the stabilization of these bonds. Now, the 3½ per cent bonds sell at a premium. Will the gentleman please explain why it is that the 4¼ per cent liberty bonds sell at such a discount?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not explain that, and I do not think it can be explained. Some think there is manipulation by some people to put down the bonds in order to force a higher rate of interest, and many others think the greater cause for the depreciation is the taxes to which they are subject. The second and third liberty bonds are subject to taxes, while the 3½ per cent first liberty bonds are exempt from taxes of all kinds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think that the 4¼ per cent bonds should be put on a parity with the 3½ per cent bonds, or at least be kept up to par? Is it not embarrassing to go out and recommend the sale of these bonds at par when people can go on the market and buy a $100 bond for $94.50?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you what I think. I think that to-day or to-morrow or at any time within the next 60 days you could not buy $500,000,000 of bonds for less than par.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are doing it to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think you could buy a few hundred thousand dollars' worth, and maybe a few million dollars' worth. The Treasury Department think, and to some extent our committee agrees with them, that the passage of this bill will bring them up to about par.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is a provision in this bill that the President may prohibit the sale or transfer of these bonds; and while the gentleman thinks he will not exercise it, will it not be a little embarrassing, and will it not impede the sale of these bonds if we have to confess in answer to questions that the President might prohibit the transfer of them; and if that authority is to be given to the President, would it not be wise to wait until these bonds are disposed of?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the argument would be the other way, that this power of the President to prohibit a transaction which I have called attention to would make the bonds more valuable—that is, would carry the bonds up to nearer par.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have given the question some attention, and I have been in favor of prohibiting the market quotations. I think that would cure the difficulty in a great measure.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would be within the power of the President. I think the President would study the different transactions with reference to dealing with bonds, and after conferring with representative business men and the Treasury Department would regulate or prohibit transactions that tended to depreciate the value of the bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope some one will have the right to deal with this matter, but I think to prohibit the sale, to prohibit any man from dealing with his property as he sees fit, would be unconstitutional.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. The power is given to prohibit any transactions in bonds. Would it not discourage, rather than encourage, the person of small means if he is informed that he can not sell his bonds, and would it not interfere with the deposit of these bonds in the banks as collateral? Would not the banks say that they are not liquid assets and we do not want them?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think any bank in the United States would give that as a reason if they wanted to loan the money. If they did not want to loan it they might give it as an excuse. There is no bank in the country that does not know that the President would not prohibit the sale of bonds to the extent of not making them liquid. If he did, the bond worth $100 would go down to 95 and he would be doing the very thing that he did not want to do. Of course, he would never do that. If men buy these liberty bonds at 100, which they must pay for them, the President would never issue an order that no man could transfer his bond; if he did they would go down to 90 per cent and perhaps lower. I do not believe the President of the United States would ever be as unwise as that.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know that a great many persons have bought bonds, not because they wanted them, but because they did not desire to be thought unpatriotic, and they have to get rid of them? I live in a manufacturing city, and I know that a great many of the products have been sent to the West and Northwest in exchange for bonds. Who is going to be the better one to determine whether the purchaser may dispose of his bonds or not?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman refers to selling products in exchange for bonds. I think that it would have been a good thing if most of such transactions that I have heard of had been prohibited.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield, I think it would be proper for the chairman to state that the committee has under consideration the Canadian system of stabilization of bonds, where all bonds must pass through a committee before they can be marketed, and in that way it has a tendency to keep the value up and prevent trading that would cause violent fluctuations.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROSE. Under existing law no one person at any one time is permitted to hold more than $1,000 of war-savings certificates. In this section 2 it provides that they can hold at least $1,000 of any issue.

Mr. KITCHIN. Each series.

Mr. ROSE. I wondered if the section goes far enough to allow any person who desires to purchase a series of one year in the next year. Will he be permitted to purchase the series of 1918 in 1919, or can he buy them at any time?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it provides that he can hold a thousand dollars of each series.

Mr. ROSE. And no time limit when he shall purchase them?

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is a series of 1918, 1919, and 1920, you can hold a thousand dollars of each series.

Mr. ROSE. Must he buy the series of 1918 in 1918?

Mr. KITCHIN. You can own war-savings certificates of any series to the extent of a thousand dollars. The Treasury Department might issue two series in one year, and then you could have $2,000 worth in that one year.

Mr. ROSE. The point I am making is whether or not you have to buy the series of 1918 during the year of 1918 under the present law? This provision does not go far enough to say that the purchaser can purchase the series at any time after they are issued; that is, following the year of the issue. In other words, can he buy the issue of 1918 series in 1919?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that. I think that, to hold $1,000 of any series, one will have to purchase that amount during the year in which the series is offered.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In respect to section 6 I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understood the gentleman to say that a banker might, in acting upon a request for a loan, if he said the bonds were not liquid, that he might give that as an excuse, but not as the real reason for refusing to extend the credit.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Let me suggest this case to the gentleman. Take a small bank away out on the prairie that may have already accepted $100,000 worth of bonds as collateral for loans. If under this section 6 a prohibition were made against the sale of these bonds, and if I walked in the bank and asked for a loan and offered liberty bonds as security, does the gentleman not think it would be very reasonable for the cashier to say that the bank already has $100,000 of collateral which it thought was liquid when they got it, but which proves to be not liquid, and that it is more collateral of that sort which is not liquid than they ought to have in the bank, and for that reason refuse to make me a loan?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would be a splendid reason for the bank to give under these circumstances the gentleman mentions; and if I were the banker, or if I were a lender of money, of course I would not loan a penny on liberty bonds as security for any notes if we had a President unwise and foolish and idiotic enough to say, knowing that we had to sell bonds in the future, that no man shall transfer his bonds; that he shall keep them in his pocket or in his safe; and that he can not deposit them as security and can not transfer them. That has to be an order before this bank can have that excuse. If the President issued such an order, that would be a reason for the bank to give; but if he were to issue such an order as that, the bonds would immediately decline to $85 or $90. Of course the President would have the power to do that under this legislation, but I am sure he would not issue such an order.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does the gentleman, for whom I entertain a high regard, think that it is necessary that he should have that power?

Mr. KITCHIN. He ought to have the power to prohibit some sort of transactions, and we determined that it was preferable to give him this power than to provide a limited power which might be entirely inadequate to meet conditions that might arise.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It is the belief, then, of the gentleman that it is necessary to grant broad powers?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to prohibit some kinds of transactions that are having a tendency to bear the bonds down, when, as a matter of fact, they are inherently worth par. I believe a country as large and as powerful and as rich as this, when it issues its pledge to pay, 20 or 30 years from now, $1,000, and to pay thereon 4¼ per cent interest, payable semiannually, issues thereby a bond which is worth dollar for dollar; but I can see how a great many little transactions with respect to bond dealings can exist, and be permitted to exist, that would really make the market value lower. I think the President will consider those transactions. We know of certain transactions now that we could limit, and we could have provided him with power to prohibit those particular things, but it would not be 24 hours before those same manipulators would conceive of some other transaction that did not come within the law which ought also to be prohibited. Then we would have to come here and pass another law; and so we gave him the broad power, knowing, of course, that he would not exercise it to the detriment of the bonds, for every time he does that the bond is going down. The very object of this bill—and I know the desire of the administration and the Treasury Department and all of the patriotic citizens—is to keep our bonds as high as possible—certainly at par.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of this committee, agrees with me that we should have nothing here that will prevent the sale of these bonds to all who are able to buy them.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. HAYES. There is a very large class of people in the United States, business men, who, for example, at certain times of the year have quite a large amount of money which they could spare for a little time, and they will be inclined as a patriotic duty to help out and buy these bonds; but if there is a threat upon the statutes of the United States that the President of the United States, at his discretion, may say that they can not sell those bonds when they need the money in their business, they will be deterred from buying the bonds. I know that to be so, and I think it is a very dangerous proposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that every unlimited, unqualified power which you give to anyone is dangerous.

Mr. HAYES. But it is dangerous for this reason—not that I distrust the President of the United States. That is not the point; but the very fact that it is there is dangerous. Capital is timid, and when men need money they must have it, if they are in business, in order to save themselves, and to put in such a provision as that will make men timid about buying bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Capital is timid, but capital has a lot of sense, and capital knows as well as anything in the world that the President of the United States nor anyone connected with the Government is not going to do any act, use any power, that will depreciate the pledge, the bond, of the United States, but they will use that power to appreciate it. Capital knows that. I am like the gentleman from California and other gentlemen. That provision bothered me. It is so large a power. We considered whether we should not eliminate the word "prohibit," but that would not do; and then we tried to limit the power, and, as I just said, when we endeavored to limit the power we found out that we could not determine where to stop.

Mr. HAYES. If there is no occasion as yet for the exercise of such power, why put such a general provision in the law? When the time comes that abuses arise let us meet those abuses by proper legislation.

Mr. KITCHIN. But we will not have time to meet those abuses when the liberty-bond sale is going to begin on September 28.

Mr. HAYES. Then instead of helping the liberty-bond sale it will injure it, in my judgment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I doubt it.

Mr. HAYES. I think it will.

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is any one man in the United States who is pretty well acquainted with the caprices and timidities and operations of what we call capital and of investors, it is the gentleman who is Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Leffingwell. I understand that before he came to the Treasury Department he was a lawyer who represented those who dealt in securities. This matter was discussed with him, and it is his judgment that instead of having a tendency to check or injure the sale of bonds it will greatly help the sale, because every man knows the President is going to use that power to appreciate the bonds he buys and keep them at par rather than do anything to depreciate them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman is aware the Secretary of the Treasury has already advised the people against the sale of bonds and urged them not to sell them; that the general trend has been throughout the country not to prohibit but at least to advise against the sale of bonds. Does not the gentleman think that the public seeing that word "prohibit"—I have not heard of there being advanced a single reason why the sale of bonds should be prohibited—that that very thing is going to frighten the investors when they know that authority has been given to do it? I think the gentleman from California raises a very pertinent question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think traders and traffickers should advertise, "You sell your bonds to me, and I will give you more than value received in goods and articles"? Does the gentleman think that tends to help the bond matter? Does the gentleman think that is the right thing to be done and it ought to be done?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. To purchase merchandise by bonds——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; these advertisements trying to induce purchasers to give their bonds up by the sale of merchandise. Does the gentleman think that is the proper thing?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would have to know all the circumstances surrounding such a case.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have had before us some exaggerated cases of that kind. For instance, in the case of war-savings certificates, some organization tried to induce the owners of the certificates to come and buy goods and give up their war-savings certificates to get these fellows to buy things they do not want and do not need.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Is not the trouble deeper than that? If the bonds would bring par, the gentleman's bank or a little one I am interested in would have the right to pay par for them; but the trouble is with the bill that is pending, which the gentleman reported from the Ways and Means Committee, and I am for that bill substantially—now, can we by law prevent anybody, as the gentleman from California says, selling that which he has and still keep it up to a certain value?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; if you prevent the sale of it in the cases I have given, of course it would depreciate the bonds. You can conceive that an order preventing the sale of anything that was property will depreciate the bond——

Mr. CANNON. Or——

Mr. KITCHIN. I can give a great many illustrations to the gentleman of transactions that ought to be prohibited. Well, now, how can you fix a limit specifying what kind of transactions shall be prohibited? Why, the fellow would get around the limit within 24 hours.

Mr. CANNON. I would like before general debate ceases to have 5, 10, or 15 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman shall have it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I was going to suggest that in the anxiety to reach these things which the gentleman has represented here, which must be very small in proportion to the vast sale of bonds, whether or not by putting in the word "prohibit" you are not raising a danger that will go much farther than the thing you seek to correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said awhile ago, I think that the President or the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have some power to prohibit some kinds of transactions in the interest of the value of bonds and the sale of bonds. We have studied how to limit this power. I raised that very question with Mr. Leffingwell in reference to a limit to see if we could find a limit in reference to the exercise of that power. The men in the Treasury Department, I understand, conferred with the representatives of business men and bankers, and, as I said before, they concluded that it was not advisable to limit this power; and, as I said, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Leffingwell, is in touch and knows as much about the sale of securities as any man in the United States, and he is absolutely of the opinion that this provision will help instead of hinder, and as the responsibility to sell these bonds is absolutely on the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration and not on us here in Congress, why, if they were willing to take that risk, I said to the committee, it looks as though we could take the risk, too. Perhaps if we were responsible, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, for the sale of these bonds, Congress might not write the word "prohibit" in. We may think it would hinder the sale of the bonds, but we, not having that responsibility upon us to make these sales, and they having the responsibility for making these sales, I am willing to trust that word "prohibit" to them, and let us see how it will turn out.

Mr. NORTON. Section 5 would permit the President to put in force a similar regulation that they have in Canada?

Mr. KITCHIN. He could do that. I understand from the gentleman from Ohio that Canada has a remarkable system—I am not well acquainted with it—of marketing and of regulating the sale of these bonds after the original sale, and, as he said, the committee is going to consider that. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury will consider the marketing and the sale of bonds after the original sale, and they will have the experience of other nations and will prescribe such rules and regulations as will tend to keep our bonds at par.

Mr. NORTON. The Treasury, I understand, has reason to suspect now there have been fraudulent transactions in bonds to depreciate——

Mr. KITCHIN. In order to depreciate them.

Mr. NORTON. I want to inquire in reference to section 1. Section 1 does not release from the normal tax any of these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because they are all released. No liberty bonds pay a normal tax at all.

Mr. NORTON. Up to $5,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all. The revenue bill now pending has a normal tax of 12 per cent. The interest from all bonds is absolutely exempt from the 12 per cent normal tax. The second liberty-bond act provided that the bonds shall be exempted from the normal tax. That is, it exempted all bonds from all taxes except surtaxes, excess-profits and war-profits tax, and inheritance or estate taxes.

Mr. RAKER. I wanted to ask the chairman in regard to section 6 as amending section 5200 of the Revised Statutes. In the first place, could a national bank, an association, an organization, with a capital stock, actually paid in and unimpaired, of $100,000, loan to a customer $10,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Now, the same bank, with an unimpaired surplus fund of $100,000, could loan to this same customer another $10,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. By the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same.

Mr. RAKER. I am assuming that the bank has $100,000 of capital actually paid in and unimpaired, and a customer comes and can get $10,000. Now, if this same bank has a surplus fund, this same customer can get another $10,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. The existing law already provides that the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actual existing values is not considered as borrowed money. The provision that the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same shall not be considered as borrowed money is also now provided for under existing law.

Mr. RAKER. What does this provision mean, then?

Mr. KITCHIN. What?

Mr. RAKER. I refer to this:

The total liabilities to any association of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof shall at no time exceed 10 per centum of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in and unimpaired.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the law now.

Mr. RAKER. And 10 per cent of this unimpaired surplus fund?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the law now. Ten per cent of its capital and surplus.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now under this provision he can borrow an additional amount equal to 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank by securing the note with liberty bonds.

Mr. RAKER. What I wanted to ask was with regard to the proviso in brackets in lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 6.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury can prescribe rules to increase the additional 10 per cent limit.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, he can make it 15 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. Or 20 or 25 per cent; anything they think safe. That is, they can have this 10 per cent additional loan by securing the note with liberty bonds without making any request on the Treasury Department, but if they want more than 10 per cent additional they have to have additional authority under rules prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RAKER. And then when the rules and regulations are prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury they can go according to them?

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me just for a moment before he yields the floor?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I wanted to make some further suggestion in line with my former suggestions. I am a business man, for example. At the last liberty-loan drive I bought $10,000 worth of bonds with the intent that when the drive was over and everything settled down they could be sold at the best price obtainable as a matter of public duty and patriotism. Now, if such a provision as this is inserted in here, notwithstanding what the gentleman says, I should hesitate about buying $10,000 worth of bonds, because my business requires that money, and I can not keep it permanently out of the business. I am putting a suppositious case. I am not the only business man in that situation. There are scores of them all over the country.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman entertains the same fears that I first entertained, but the gentleman is not selling these bonds.

Mr. HAYES. I know, but——

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait one minute. You fear that it will have a deterrent effect on the sale of bonds?

Mr. HAYES. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. KITCHIN. I had that fear. Now, that is the fear of a gentleman who has no duty to perform in the sale of bonds, or no responsibility in the selling of the bonds, or we only have it as a general interest.

Mr. HAYES. I have a responsibility in legislation.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know, but this is legislation that does not just concern the sale of these bonds.

Mr. HAYES. Oh, no. There is more than that.

Mr. KITCHIN. If, then, the man who is responsible for the sale of these bonds, upon whose shoulders this vast responsibility rests, the man whose duty under the law is to sell these bonds, said to you and to me, "We can better sell these bonds with that word in the law than we can without it being in," whose judgment shall Congress take? It is simply a matter of judgment. And, another thing, we do take a responsibility in not putting the word "prohibit" in when the man who is responsible for the sale tells us that if we leave it out he can not sell these bonds and if we put it in he can sell them better. Suppose we go into the campaign with the word left out and we would not sell the bonds, would not a whole lot of folks in this country be glad to say, 'If Congress had done what Secretary McAdoo said and had put in the word 'prohibit,' so that the President in his wisdom and patriotism could make such rules and regulations about the sale and traffic in these bonds as to appreciate the bonds and induce people to buy, it would have been all right?" That would be taking a little too vast responsibility, gentlemen. I felt somewhat as you do at first, but after I thought about it, I said, "The responsibility is not on me but on them."

I am not going to let the Treasury Department or the Secretary of the Treasury or Mr. Leffingwell or anybody else put any part of the responsibility on me for these bonds not being sold, and sold well, and I do not think we had better take that responsibility now.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman permit me just one more suggestion?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. It is this: That as legislators here we have to take the responsibility of granting a very extraordinary power, which is the giving to one man the power to say that the purchasers of these bonds shall not have the right under certain conditions to sell them. That is an extraordinary grant of power, and it is my responsibility, and it is your responsibility, and it is the responsibility of every Member of this House, whether the Presdent shall have that power or not.

We must act on our judgment and knowledge of conditions in the country, and that is the only way we can intelligently act. That is not the responsibility of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury. It is ours. In my judgment, the fact that we grant such an extraordinary power as that to any man, I care not who he is, is sufficient to make the man who can not spare his money for any length of time, but must have it returned to him in the near future, hesitate about putting that money into bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought you were not going to state the proposition that we all feared; that is, that the provision will have a checking and hindering effect on the sale of bonds. I thought you were going to put another proposition.

All of us may differ as to the possible effect of this provision on the sale of bonds. I am willing for the man who is responsible for the sale of these bonds to take the responsibility for this word "prohibit," and I rather think it will help appreciate the bonds. I think the President, under this provision, can announce before the sale of the liberty bonds such rules and regulations as will help the sale. The policy of giving the President this power is one as to which we may well differ; but I know there is but one answer to it, otherwise I would not give it to him. I know it is absolutely impossible for him to prevent my selling my bond by issuing that order, because as soon as he issues that order the very bonds that he wishes to make valuable will go right down in value. He knows it. I know it is impossible to issue any such order.

Mr. HAYES. Why, then, give him the authority here to do it?

Mr. KITCHIN. We give him authority not because we think it will be exercised, except where it ought to be exercised.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give us an illustration?

Mr. KITCHIN. We give the President the power, if he wants to exercise it, to order that these two or three million extra men that we are going to send to France shall go over in canoes; to get two or three million canoes about as long as from here to you and give each man a paddle and say, "You have got to go across and fight the Hun," and they must try it. He has the power to make that order, but I do not think there is any man in the United States who thinks that he will exercise that power by making that order. But we had to give him powers that included every such rash and impossible thing as that, and we have got to give him this power. And in giving it to him, of course, it includes all these extreme and inconceivable and unimaginable powers.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not the purpose in that section that the President may protect the bondholders?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to protect the bondholders and help the sale of the bonds.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury or his representative, Mr. Leffingwell, gave to the committee any reason why the success of this next loan is not equally involved in the amendment proposed to section 5 and section 4 of this bill? The Secretary of the Treasury in his letter to the committee simply says with reference to section 5—

I believe it is highly desirable that the President be empowered to investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, and the export, hoarding, melting—

And so forth. He says not a word about prohibiting the sale of bonds. Did Mr. Leffingwell give any reason for that in the flotation of this new issue?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have discussed that with Mr. Leffingwell. I discussed the matter of giving him the power to prohibit in many cases in transactions with respect to Government bonds, and he gave the reasons that I have given here.

Mr. WALSH. Only the reasons that the gentleman has stated heretofore?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Then I am going to stop.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand the gentleman, while he recognizes the fact that the word "prohibit" confers a vast power, he does not know how to limit it and still give the President the power that he ought to have?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the necessary power that he ought to have.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman as to the language that has been discussed and which has been feared, which many gentleman think, if left in the bill, will retard very materially the sale of liberty bonds. It is this:

That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency.

And so forth. The gentleman does not believe that the President, acting under that, would ever prohibit the sale by one citizen to another of his bond?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. RUCKER. What objection is there to putting in a proviso to the effect that "nothing herein contained shall be construed as to confer power to prohibit the sale of bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States"? Why should not that do?

Mr. KITCHIN. That would not do, because there are certain transactions which he ought to prohibit.

Mr. RUCKER. He could then investigate and regulate and prohibit everything else except the sale, and, as I understand, that is not contemplated.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; there are a great many sales that he ought to prohibit. The gentleman was not here——

Mr. RUCKER. I have heard what the gentleman said, but I probably did not understand it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think the gentleman was here at the opening this morning.

Mr. RUCKER. No; I was not.

Mr. KITCHIN. There are a great many transactions that ought to be prohibited. For instance, there are certain merchants who are advertising to their customers who come in to buy goods that they will give them a discount on the bonds.

Mr. RUCKER. Then, why not insert a proviso that it is not intended to confer power to prohibit the sale of certificates of indebtedness or bonds of the United States by the man actually buying the bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think that would be satisfactory.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have given notice two or three times that I am going to stop.

Mr. ROBBINS. I refer to section 5. As it stands now, I think it contains a power that is dangerous to confer upon anyone, to tamper with the regular banking facilities of the country. Now, why not add to the end of this provision a limitation that the powers herein conveyed shall terminate with the end of the war? Then we would all know that there would be a time when we would be relieved from the fear of the exercise of this power that this section contains, to my mind at least, that it is going to render these bonds unmarketable to those who purchase them.

Mr. KITCHIN. I see no great objection to limiting it to a year or two years after the end of the war. I am not acquainted with all the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act. If there is a member of the Judiciary Committee here I would like to know whether the provisions of that act are limited to the period of the war or to a year or two years after the war? My idea is that most of the provisions say "during the war." If so, this is a part of the trading-with-the-enemy act.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will send out and get that act. The thing that suggested itself to me, viewing it from the bankers' and investors' standpoint, was that, as the bankers are going to have to take these bonds primarily, as they took the first, second, and third liberty bonds, and then deal them out to their customers, if the President can prohibit the transfer of these bonds, investors and bankers will not dare buy them.

Mr. KITCHIN. The President is as anxious as any living man can be to keep the bonds at par. Does the gentleman think he would issue any order that would depreciate the value of the bonds? And if he did, and found that it had that effect, would it not be his absolute duty as a patriot to revoke or rescind the order?

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not questioning the patriotism either of the President or the investing public.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. But a large number of these bonds are going to be taken by people who will be making their first investment in bonds. They are going to be taken by foreigners who do not understand the nature of Government securities.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to say to the gentleman, as I said when he happened to be out——

Mr. ROBBINS. I was called to the phone.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Treasury has the duty and responsibility of selling these bonds. That duty and that responsibility do not devolve upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania or upon me or upon the House. If the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that this section is going to help him sell the bonds, does not the gentleman think it is better to let him take the responsibility by passing this section as it is written than for us to attempt to shoulder it? If we strike out any of this provision, and he does not sell the bonds, may it not be said that if the House had done what the Secretary of the Treasury asked us to do, the bonds might have been sold?

Mr. DENISON. For the same reason, why not let him fix the rate of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. You might ask, Why not let him fix the amount?

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman says he will do what is best for the country.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think he will, but I think we ought to fix the amount and the rate of interest; but the manner of selling may well be left to him. That is different. I am not willing to say that he may fix a rate of interest of 5, 6, 8, or 10 per cent. We limit that, as we properly should.

Mr. RUCKER. Does not the gentleman think that the Secretary ought to impart to us all the information that he can impart to the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, the gentleman has not been here all the time I have been talking. I do not blame him for not listening to me; but I have certainly given an hour to explaining why it probably is better to leave that provision in the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say to the gentleman that I have listened attentively—not to all he said, because he has said so much that I did not have time to hear it all.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman know whether the large bankers, who are expecting to take a large number of these bonds, are favorable to this provision?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that the bankers who will take these bonds and help to sell them are very anxious that some power be given in the Treasury Department or the administration to prohibit certain transactions.

Mr. HAYES. That can be done by regulation, without prohibiting the sale absolutely.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I explained here to-day, if you strike out the word "prohibit," I think he can still prohibit by regulation.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is not that covered in Canada by a regulation of the stock exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. They have a system there by which all these bond dealings go through a committee.

Mr. ROBBINS. Of the stock exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know about the stock exchange.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is not an act of the Dominion, but it is a regulation of the stock exchange, as I understand.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I do not know about any action of the minister of finance in the Canadian treasury department.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement in regard to the trading-with-the-enemy act to which the gentleman from North Carolina alluded a moment ago?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. That act prohibits everything that is in section 5, subdivision "b," except bonds and hoarding gold. It is the present law with those exceptions. Now, the gentleman inquired whether there was anything in the act which confined the powers to the end of the war. In some sections there is a provision to that effect, and the end of the war is defined as follows:

The words "end of the war," as used herein, shall be deemed to mean the date of proclamation of exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless the President shall, by proclamation, declare a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be the "end of the war" within the meaning of this act.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] then is answered by that, because this section amends section 5 of that act and it would be limited to the end of the war.

Mr. HAYES. But this is the last enactment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is any doubt about that. That means section 5 of that act. We do not amend the section which says that it shall terminate at the end of the war. I will say that I am in sympathy with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. HAYES. But is the gentleman clear about that, that it would limit it to the end of the war?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is any trouble about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit? I think the clause called to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from Massachusetts has no application whatever to this section of the trading-with-the-enemy act.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman to say that the limitation was with reference to the whole act.

Mr. WALSH. No; I said certain of its sections are limited to the end of the war, and that the end of the war was defined as I read it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no such phrase as "the end of the war" in section 5 in the trading-with-the-enemy act.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that this trading-with-the-enemy act terminated at the end of the war—that is, the whole act.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no such provision in the act itself.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, then I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will look it up. I can see no objection to making this limitation to end at the termination of the war as to the regulation or prohibition of the sale of bonds and certificates of indebtedness, limiting it to the end, say, of one or two years after the war.

Mr. HAYES. Why not say at the expiration of the war?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not put it at the expiration of the war because there might something arise, some condition or situation come up, that is so akin to war that war conditions might apply to it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to permit an interruption from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and after that I am going to make one more effort to stop. I will say that the gentleman from Illinois can get his 10 minutes under the five-minute rule.

Mr. McFADDEN. I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy. I want to call attention to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in which he refers to section 5. The Secretary says:

I believe it is highly desirable at this time that the President should be empowered to investigate, regulate, or prohibit not only the export or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, but also the hoarding or melting thereof.

Now, the Secretary did not say Government bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; but I have discussed the matter with the Secretary and Mr. Leffingwell.

Mr. McFADDEN. The point I want to ascertain is whether this was put in by the Ways and Means Committee or is the suggestion of the Treasury Department.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the Ways and Means Committee had expressed its fear about granting this power, but the department has got to sell the bonds, and the responsibility is on them, and from that angle of it the committee felt that it did not affect the real inherent right of the individual to transfer his property, but only affected the sale of the bonds, and as the Treasury desired to take the responsibility the committee thought it was a wise thing to give the President this power. I do not want to share the responsibility of limiting this provision.

Mr. McFADDEN. I wanted to make the matter clear on that point. Now, will the gentleman permit an observation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; only one.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to say that if the authority is given to the President in this section, I am of the opinion that if he exercises it to prohibit the sale of securities of the United States Government, that immediately there will have to be declared a moratorium on the debts in the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is right, and that is the reason why I know that it is impossible for the President to exercise the power to such an extent as gentlemen seem to fear.

Now, I want to say that since the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas that Gov. Harding and the Federal Reserve Board had perhaps been against section 4 in regard to stabilizing and rectifying foreign exchanges, and so forth, I had my clerk phone to Mr. Leffingwell to see Gov. Harding and members of the Federal Reserve Board, and ask him to take the provision to them and ascertain their objections to it. Mr. Leffingwell phones the clerk that he has seen Gov. Harding, and that he authorized him to say that he has seen the provision, and he not only has no objection to it but that he heartily commends it and thinks it a wise provision, and that it should be enacted in this bill. I wanted to make that statement in justice to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am going to be very brief in what I have to say. The object of this bill, so far as the exemption of taxes on the income of Government bonds is concerned, is to make more attractive the sale of Government bonds to purchasers. I have at all times been in favor of a tax-exempt Government bond. I do not believe simply because the Government bond is better security than any other security offered that it will sell as readily upon the market bearing a rate of interest of 4¼ per cent, as will other securities that bring higher rates, 5 and 6 per cent, unless there is some redeeming feature other than its actual security value. I contend, in the first place, upon the first issue of Government bonds that unless we exempted the Government bond from taxes we would be compelled to pay a higher rate of interest than otherwise. This legislation now suggested is an absolute proof of the correctness of that contention. There is a provision in the new revenue bill which is absolutely inconsistent with the purpose of this bill. This bill proposes to exempt in the hands of the individual, or corporation, or association the income from Government bonds from excess profits, supertaxes, and war-profits taxes. In other words, the supertax imposed by this new revenue bill upon the income of an individual ranges from 6 per cent to 65 per cent.

The income from Government bonds is exempt from normal income taxes. Therefore, on the individual the supertax will average perhaps 25 per cent of the average man's income; that is to say, the tax will take from him at least 25 per cent of his income. In the new revenue bill, which I have spoken of before, there is a penalty of an extra 6 per cent upon corporations upon earnings of this taxable year for the nondistribution of those earnings. In other words, the income of the corporations for this taxable year, if distributed to the stockholders, pays 12 per cent normal tax, and if not distributed it must pay an additional 6 per cent, or a total of 18 per cent normal tax. This bill proposes to remove from income taxes, excess-profits taxes, and war taxes the income from a Government bond in the hands of a corporation. How do you suppose a corporation can use the earnings of this year invested in Government bonds, which Government bonds upon their face bear a rate of interest at 4¼ per cent, and at the same time pay a penalty of an extra 6 per cent for investing that money in Government bonds and not distributing it to the stockholder? That is the inconsistency of the provision in the new revenue bill, which is the purposes of this bill.

Let me show you what the tax means to an investor in Government bonds, in a supertax in the hands of an individual. The average tax, which will be about 24 per cent, say, and I am only guessing at it, but I think that is a fair estimated average, would take from the individual fifty-one one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the interest paid to him by the Government upon these bonds, leaving him in round numbers 3¾ per cent income from the Government bond which pays 4¼ per cent interest. I contended in the first place that Government bonds bear a higher rate of interest if taxable than if nontaxable. That illustration in the hands of the individual of one-half of 1 per cent of your 4¼ per cent of interest is proof of that contention. That would average the purchaser 3¾ per cent interest, so that a bond bearing 3¾ per cent interest nontaxable is just as valuable in his hands as a 4¼ per cent interest bond subject to taxes. Suppose a corporation purchases a large amount of Government bonds this year, and the earnings of that corporation come under the excess-profits tax provisions of the new revenue bill, which is a graduated supertax of 35, 50, and 70 per cent.

The revenue bill provides that 15 per cent of the corporation's income, or that portion of its earnings 15 per cent above exemptions, must pay 35 per cent taxes. On the next 5 per cent of earnings, from 15 per cent to 20 per cent, it pays 50 per cent taxes. The Government takes one-half of that 5 per cent, and on all profits above 20 per cent it pays 70 per cent. Suppose the average to be 50 per cent. If this bill does not pass, the income from interest on Government bonds in the hands of a corporation paying excess-profits taxes will yield to the corporation but 2⅛ per cent interest over and above the tax. Figure it out. That is right. Suppose that corporation pays a tax this year under the war-profits tax. Then the earnings from Government bonds in the hands of the corporation that comes under the war-profits tax pay 80 per cent of 4¼ per cent interest received, leaving the corporation but eighty-five hundredths of 1 per cent of the 4¼ per cent income from interest on Government bonds. That is a very severe tax. There is no inducement for anyone to purchase Government bonds under those circumstances. A corporation whose income on interest net to them is only eighty-five hundredths of 1 per cent will not feel like purchasing Government bonds, especially in view of the fact that it must pay a penalty of 6 per cent for investing its money in Government bonds instead of paying out their profits among their stockholders. It would take a year and a half to get back the penalty, or nearly so, at 4¼ per cent on your Government bonds.

Those are the features of these two bills that are important for you and I to consider. Therefore I am most heartily in favor of the enactment of this proposed bill about which we are now talking, because it exempts from taxes these Government bonds. The purpose of giving a high rate of interest on Government bonds was this: It could be plainly seen that the Government was going to issue twenty or thirty or forty billions of dollars' worth of Government bonds during this war. The higher the rate of interest those bonds bear the more taxes would be collected from the average individual. That is the purpose of a high rate of interest on a Government bond. There is no other purpose. Of course, it makes the bond attractive to give it a high rate of interest, but then they turn right around after giving you 4¼ per cent interest and take a half per cent of that from you in taxes. That is what it means. In order to get somewhere from fifty to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars a year more money in the hands of the individuals to be taxed they are ready to impose an additional high rate of interest upon the people of the country.

Who pays this interest upon these Government bonds? The people. It must come from somewhere. Somebody must pay it. What does a half of 1 per cent interest on $30,000,000,000 of bonds mean per year? One hundred and fifty million dollars. Therefore, a quarter of 1 per cent means that we must tax the people each year $75,000,000 more than we would tax them if the interest your bond bore were one-quarter of 1 per cent less than the rate of interest it does bear. That is a mathematical proposition. But because the Government needs large sums of money now to carry on this war—and those bonds are to run undoubtedly 20 to 30 years before they will be paid—for the purpose of getting $100,000,000 to $125,000,000 a year in the Treasury now each year this extra high rate of interest imposes upon the people $150,000,000 a year for all time or until those bonds are paid.

Pretty serious proposition when you look at it in that light, my friends. Therefore I say if we pass this bill we will make more attractive to the purchaser a Government bond bearing a lower rate of interest. I believe we could have readily sold a nontaxable Government bond down to date as readily at 3½ per cent as we are selling at 4¼ per cent if they were made nontaxable.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do; yes, sir.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not a fact of this law practically to make all early issues of bonds tax free?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; and these bonds, too.

Mr. BORLAND. There will be $6,000,000,000 of this fourth issue?

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, suppose these $6,000,000,000 were bought by a class of people who would be liable to these high surtaxes, all of them. Then they would be entitled to go out and buy $9,000,000,000 of earlier issues and escape taxation on them.

Now there are only $10,000,000,000 of the early issues outstanding. In other words, it would be possible for the millionaire class of this country by absorbing this fourth issue to make all the previous issues free from surtaxes which they had in their hands. Is not that almost the case?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman, your argument is that this bill benefits the millionaire and not the mass of the people?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; unquestionably.

Mr. FORDNEY. You are absolutely wrong, so far as my judgment goes, my good friend. We are paying high prices for everything we consume in the country to-day. Now, who pays it, who pays these high prices——

Mr. BORLAND. The poor people.

Mr. FORDNEY. Who pays the profits? This new revenue law proposes to tax you on your income and me and everybody else on their income. Where do you get your income from; that is the point. Where do you get your profits from? Where do I get my profit; where does the manufacturer and everybody who produces something for sale get his profit? He gets it right out of the man who buys his product—the consumer. If he does not make a profit, he does not pay the tax. If he does make a profit, he obtains it from the man who buys the product. Is not that right?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, who buys the product; who buys the beefsteak; who buys the boots and shoes; who buys the clothing?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Nobody much now.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me give an illustration. Not long ago I sat down to the table for dinner one evening. There was a delicious beefsteak upon the table costing 50 cents a pound; 5 pounds, costing $2.50. When I learned the value of this beefsteak I had paid for—it was on my own table—I realized that all the profit made out of the beefsteak from the time the animal was born upon the farm to the time it went on my table I paid for it. Did I not?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably.

Mr. DECKER. On the whole beef?

Mr. FORDNEY. On what I ate, what I had, I am speaking of a 5-pound beefsteak on my table. Now, I never realized so fully before on an article produced in this country and sold to the masses of the people that the person who consumes it pays all the profits. If I do not make a profit in my business then this year I do not have to pay any tax under this law, but if I do make a profit it comes out of the people who buy my product.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will excuse me, we have been trying to tell the gentleman that for many years; that under a protective tariff the consumer paid all the profits. We have tried to educate the gentleman in years gone by.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman ought to know better than that. You are an intelligent fellow, I give you credit for being intelligent.

Mr. BORLAND. We have tried to convince the gentleman that the consumer paid the freight.

Mr. FORDNEY. We can not both talk at once and have the stenographer get both arguments. You forced me into an explanation, and I will tell you where you are in error. You and I are engaged in business in this country producing an article of the same kind, and we are in competition with each other. Our labor costs, our raw material, our taxes, everything else, are exactly the same. It does not make any difference now what that product cost is, you and I are exactly in this country operating alike under all conditions that exist here. Now, the gentleman has brought in the tariff question. You are, suppose, a foreigner, living in China or in Japan. You are producing the same article over there that I am producing here, and your labor cost is one-fourth of my labor cost, and the labor cost in every article produced in the world is at least 90 per cent of its total cost. [Applause on the Republican side.] You can undersell me unless we have a protective tariff against your cheap-made products. That is the difference between foreign competition and our competition of two men engaged in production in this country.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, the gentleman is still right on the proposition that the consumer pays the freight.

Mr. FORDNEY. Of course I am right, and the gentleman knows it; but he wants to be funny.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to have an answer to the question about the bonds.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be pleased to give it.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not possible under the issue of the fourth liberty loan of $6,000,000,000, by giving the holders of the original subscription to that loan the right to go out and buy 150 per cent of other subscriptions of the earlier bonds, for them to go tax free and possibly enable them to buy perhaps over $9,000,000 of previous issues and make them tax free?

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, we must realize—nobody realizes it any more so than the Secretary of the Treasury—that in order to sell these liberty bonds offered on the 28th of this month we must go where the money is in order to find a purchaser.

Mr. BORLAND rose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute—you have run down an eight-day wind-up—and let me answer you, please. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If you will examine the sales of the first liberty bonds you will find that the average purchase of bonds in this country was less than $100. Millionaires did not get in their work, very much to your dissatisfaction. The masses of the people purchased those bonds and are going to purchase the majority of these bonds, too; but they must be largely sold to the banks of this country, and the banks peddle them out to their customers—to the average man. But they must be sold readily and quickly in order to let our Government obtain money to support our boys on the battle field. I do not care whether it is a poor man or millionaire that puts his money in the Government bonds. The millionaire is just as much entitled to a fair deal as anybody else if he will put up his money to help this Government win this great war. I have no prejudice against the millionaire——

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is right about that; but I wanted to call his attention to the fact that his theory that all Government bonds ought to be tax free is going to be realized, practically, under this bill, because this bill is going to make the earlier issues of bonds go to par and perhaps more than par. That is the purpose. It is going to do that, and make the subscribers to the fourth loan go out and buy 90 per cent of their subscriptions from the first loan.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you purchase some of these fourth liberty loan bonds, it makes it possible for you to go out and purchase from other bondholders some of the former issues of bonds and then be exempt from those taxes. But the real purpose of the bill, my good friend, is not to aid you in giving you a profit by going out and purchasing bonds that have already been disposed of by the Government, but to make it possible for this Government to sell this new issue. That is the purpose of the loan.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the main purpose, but that will not be the effect of it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. You may have already discussed it, but if so, I did not hear it. I wanted to have the gentleman's opinion of the effect of the limitation of two years upon the exemption, or partial exemption, of these bonds from taxation after the termination of the war. Does the gentleman think that is time enough to have any appreciable effect upon the price of these bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; it will have an appreciable effect; but the time is not long enough to suit me. I would rather have no limitation at all. But let me tell you that we are saving something in order to make this bond sale attractive.

If your house were on fire and you knew you could not save it, but could save something in the house, you would save all you could. Therefore, I am heartily in favor of this bill, because it goes part way toward my views of a nontaxable Government bond. And I do hope if this becomes a law and those bonds are sold, making the limitation two years, that before the expiration of those two years conditions will so prevail that we will think and see that it is wise to extend the time.

Mr. HASTINGS. In view of the fact that is acknowledged by everyone that even after the war is over we will have to raise, say, four or five billions of dollars annually, the gentleman does not hope to have any of these bonds paid off within the near future?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And I want to say now that while I have not given it the thought the gentleman from Michigan has, I do not believe that two years' exemption after the termination of this war is a sufficient length of time to have any appreciable effect upon the sale of these bonds.

Mr. FORDNEY. But the department recommended the time limit be the 31st of December of the year following the year in which peace is declared between our Government and Germany, and the committee made it a flat period of two years.

Mr. HASTINGS. Just a moment. Of course everyone when they go to buy bonds will say these are exempt from taxation, but the very next question that will arise in their mind is as to how long they will be exempt. If this war should terminate this year, they would be exempt from taxation for only two or two and one-half years, and, in my judgment, not a sufficient length of time to make the bonds go up very much in the market.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am going to try at the November election to come back to this House for two years more. I hope the gentleman does also. I hope all men who agree with me in that view will come back here, so that at the proper time we can extend that time and make those bonds more attractive in the hands of our people.

Mr. HASTINGS. We both agree on that. Each of us wants to come back.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it not a fact that this bill makes the bonds more attractive to the men of large incomes than it does to those of small incomes?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it does not make them more attractive to one man than another when the holding is above $5,000, because under existing law those bonds are exempt from taxes up to $5,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will yield, I will give him an example. Suppose A and B, each with $100,000 invested in interest-bearing securities drawing 4½ per cent. A has a large income of a million dollars. Under the present law A pays a surtax, but B, with no income in excess of $5,000, pays none. A, with the $1,000,000 income, would, under the proposed revenue bill, pay 60 per cent surtax. Change the investment into Government bonds; B, the one with the small income, gets no additional exemption, but A, the one with the million income, gets his exemption and is not required to pay the 60 per cent surtax, amounting to $2,550, on his $4,250 interest on the $100,000 investment which he would have to pay if income from other sources. A has the benefit of $2,550 over B.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, if you go to the extreme, you can say that a man with $1,000 yearly income has an exemption of $1,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am leaving that out.

Mr. FORDNEY. When a man is exempt from taxes he does not pay any tax, whereas a man with a larger income, no matter from what source that income is derived, pays a tax in accordance with the amount of his income. If his income is more than another, he is taxed more.

Here is a copy of the new law. Let me call your attention to the difference between the tax on the man with a small income and the tax on the man with a large income. This is important both to the gentleman from Iowa and to the other gentlemen who have been listening to the gentleman's argument and mine. We start in now and the law puts a 2 per cent surtax upon incomes from $5,000 to $7,500, and 3 per cent on the next $2,500, and then 5 per cent, and 7 per cent, and 10 per cent, and 15 per cent, and 20 per cent, and 25 per cent, and 30 per cent, and 35 per cent, and 40 per cent, and 46 per cent, and 48 per cent, and 50 per cent, and 52 per cent, and 54 per cent, and 56 per cent, and 58 per cent, and 60 per cent, and 65 per cent on large incomes. Those are graduations in the surtax that must be paid. The greater the man's income the greater the percentage of tax he pays. The committee has taken that into consideration.

Suppose you had $5,000 income. The question before the committee was how much tax can such a man pay and still have sufficient to support himself and his family. We agreed upon a certain sum. Now, suppose a man had $10,000 income. We figured it in a similar way. And if a man had $1,000,000 income we figured he could pay more tax, even half of that sum in taxes, and still have half a million left if he is very careful in buying the ordinary grade of beefsteak instead of the high-priced beefsteak, and so on up, he could survive. [Laughter.] The more the income is the more the tax we take from him. I think that is an equitable and just way of grading this surtax. The man with a million-dollar income will pay a high income tax. That is the difference between a tax imposed upon the poor man and the tax imposed upon the rich man by this law.

Mr. HAUGEN. But the fact remains that the man with the income of less than $5,000 pays no surtax. He gets no benefit from the investment in these bonds; but the one with a million dollars invested gets the benefit of 60 per cent, which makes a difference of $2,550. That is the difference between a man with a small income and a man with a large income.

Mr. FORDNEY. The man who pays the tax is the man to be benefited by the removal of the tax, of course. I have never found a living soul yet who wrote me about this matter that said: "I am satisfied with the tax rate." Everyone pointed out the objection to the law and said: "I am willing to pay my tax; but for God's sake put it on the other man and not on me." I have never found anybody yet who wants to be taxed.

Mr. HAUGEN. I did not raise that question. The gentleman was explaining the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know; but you were arguing this: That this law will benefit the rich man and not the poor man. The rich man is giving very liberally to run this war, as everybody else is, both rich and poor. It was stated on the floor of this House last year that this war was a poor man's fight and not a rich man's fight. The rich man's son was said to be at home and the poor man's son was said to be in the war. That was a great injustice to the rich men of the country. The rich man's son is over there doing his part, just the same as any other. They are all there, the rich and the poor alike, brothers, fighting side by side, regardless of their wealth, regardless of their education, regardless of their homes ties and their home customs. They are all there. They are all interested in the winning of this war, and it is your duty and my duty, my friends, to raise the necessary sums of money to support them over there, and support the rich man's son as well as the poor man's son, and we are doing it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I object to having the statement apply to my question, because it has nothing to do with it. I am simply pointing out the fact that there is an inequality here in favor of the man with the million-dollar income. There is a differential of $2,550, which may be proper and necessary.

Mr. FORDNEY. Pardon me. The poor man is exempt. This law proposes to exempt everybody under the same conditions.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. If you please, it does not quite do that.

Mr. FORDNEY. It does, up to $80,000. If their purchases of these various issues of bonds are of a certain percentage, they are exempt; otherwise they are not exempt.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am ready for a vote on this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Will the gentleman let me yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] first?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield such time as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] wishes.

Mr. CANNON. I want a little time before I die, but I am not on the committee.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield first to the gentleman from Illinois such time as he desires, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that we begin to read the bill under the five-minute rule, and then these gentlemen will have an opportunity.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to yield time to the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois, who requested it, and then we can read the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I have much of a message to submit to the committee. I will acknowledge now that what I do not know about gathering revenue would make a large volume. [Laughter.]

But this is the condition we are in: The 3½ per cent bond, under the first authorization of bonds and the first drive, was free of tax, and is free to-day by virtue of that legislation—free from any possible tax except alone the inheritance tax. I am right about that. Nobody contradicts that. Those bonds were readily sold. Then came the second issue, and the third, and the fourth, and this is legislation for the fifth.

Mr. WELTY. This is the fourth.

Mr. CANNON. What is this bill? The gentleman from Ohio says "the fourth." We have had the fourth, as I understand it.

Mr. WELTY. No; this is the fourth.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; concede that this is the fourth. It does not change what I want to say. Very well. We have had four acts, and this will be the fifth.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is the fifth act but the fourth loan.

Mr. GARNER. This is preparing for the fourth liberty loan, but it will be the fifth act passed by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. So be it; it does not change the principle of what I wanted to say.

There was no trouble about selling the 3½ per cent bond, because the good faith of the Government was pledged that that bond never should be taxed by the Federal Government or by State or any other taxing power, save alone that when a man died the interest upon the bond should be reached by an inheritance-tax provision. Now, it has run along, and you say that bonds are not subject to the normal tax. Was that written into the law, that they should not be subject to the normal tax? I want to find out.

Mr. GARNER. This much must be said, that when it was made subject to the surtax it was not subject to any other tax; and therefore, by not providing that it should be subject to any other tax, it can only be subject to the surtax.

Mr. KITCHIN. All the acts authorizing a bond issue exempt the liberty bonds from the normal tax. In other words, the first liberty bonds are exempted from all taxes. The second and third liberty bonds are subject only to the surtaxes, excess-profits taxes, and, of course, the State taxes, and this bill proposes to add to the excess-profits tax the war-profits tax. So all are exemped from the normal tax. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that this is not an authorization of bonds, but to help sell the bonds already authorized, and in the act authorizing the sale of the bonds the provision is that they shall be subject only to the excess-profits tax, and now the war-profits tax, the surtax, and State taxes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says that this act standing by itself is not to authorize the sale of bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. CANNON. But it puts a change of the law on the bonds that have heretofore been authorized.

Mr. GARNER. It kind of sugars them up, so as to make them more attractive.

Mr. KITCHIN. The bonds that we are going to offer in the fourth liberty loan are already authorized, and under the authorization they are exempt from the normal tax and subject to the surtaxes and excess-profits taxes, except that they have an exemption of $5,000. The gentleman from Illinois will remember that he was the author of that.

Mr. CANNON. I recollect.

Mr. KITCHIN. And this bill proposes a further exemption to those bonds authorized in the former act, which will be offered for sale in this coming liberty-bond campaign.

Mr. CANNON. I understand; and the bonds are to bear 4¼ per cent interest.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the same interest.

Mr. CANNON. There is no change in the legislation to that extent. Now, these identical bonds are to-day worth 94 cents on the dollar, and this legislation proposes to make a provision that it is hoped will enable us to sell $6,000,000,000 of the bonds. God knows that if it will, I am for it. I am for it whether it will or will not; but it seems to me that the 3½ per cent bonds tax free, free from all taxation, had the easiest and quickest sale. I believe that if you were by legislation to authorize the issue of a 3½ per cent bond absolutely tax free, with the privilege to the Government of paying it at the end of five or six years, and with the further provision that the Government must absolutely pay the principal at the end of 30 years, 40 years, or 50 years, that bond would sell at par, having the option to pay any or all of the 3½ per cent bonds at any time after five years.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will be glad to.

Mr. GARNER. Undoubtedly it would sell at par to gentlemen whose incomes exceed $50,000 a year, but no man whose income was less than $50,000 a year could buy that bond in competition with the 4¼ per cent bond. It would be only the rich man who could buy that bond, and none of the great masses of the people could afford to buy it when they could invest their money in 4¼ per cent interest bonds and have to pay no surtax.

Mr. CANNON. That would be largely cured by enlarging the $5,000 exemption that we now have. I had the honor to offer that amendment, and if there be any honor in it the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] had the honor to accept it. That was done for the purpose of popularizing the bond. Now, if it needs further popularizing to protect the poor man, increase the amount of the exemption to $10,000 or $15,000. That will take care of the moderately well-off man. But the gentleman says the rich man; that we are after his scalp. Well, I am willing to take his scalp if we can do better for a hundred million people than we can without taking his scalp. But we injure ourselves when we undertake to tax what you call the rich man, and the rich man that you want to get at is not going to take a large amount of the bonds under this bill. Perhaps if he had a large family he might distribute them around. Is the limit $80,000 under the proposed bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; including the $5,000 already exempted, and if they come within the terms of that provision it is possible for them to have $80,000 exempt.

Mr. CANNON. Well, here is a rich man. He can buy $80,000 in round numbers for himself, and he can buy $80,000 more for his wife, and for each of his two daughters, and for each son-in-law, and for each of his grandchildren, can he not?

Mr. GARNER. Not under this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Why not?

Mr. GARNER. Not unless each one of them owns that proportion of all these bonds and the record shows it. But aside from the question of the rich man, I direct attention to one feature of the gentleman's theory that it seems to me is not economically sound. If we are correctly informed there are less than $240,000,000,000 of property in the United States of all kinds.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. There are now about $15,000,000,000 worth of property not subject to taxation. If you add to that $25,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000 of untaxable bonds, you will have one-fifth or one-fourth of all the property in the country exempt from taxation. That makes the gentleman's farm and my farm have to bear that other one-fourth extra to take the place of what goes tax free. I do not think that is good economic policy.

Mr. CANNON. Your farm and my farm are getting off pretty easy from the standpoint of taxation, as far as that is concerned, and so are our neighbors. I say that when the 4 per cent bonds that were placed on the market during the administration of Rutherford B. Hayes, when John Sherman was Secretary of the Treasury, were disposed of, nobody supposed that he could ever borrow money at 4 per cent. We had paid 5, 6, and 7.3, and we owed a pretty large amount of money. We had 30,000,000 people when that indebtedness was incurred, with less than $20,000,000,000 of wealth. I think the wealth was $16,000,000,000 in 1860; that was the total wealth of the country, North and South, East and West.

John Sherman believed he could borrow the money at 4 per cent. The country laughed at him, and he was laughed at on the floor of the House and the floor of the Senate. It was not believed that he could do it, but he had the option to sell the bonds and redeem the obligations of the Government as written in the law. There were the ten-forties, the five-twenties, and others that did not run quite so long. He put the bonds upon the market and sold them, and he did redeem the obligations. They made those 4 per cent bonds available for bank circulation and they sold as high at one time as 134. Gentlemen all recollect that.

My notion is that a security that any citizen of the United States owns should be like unto the dollar, it should be at par. Now, gentlemen, talk about giving the Secretary of the Treasury or the President power to do certain things, among which is to prohibit the sale of these bonds that are to be issued when this bill is enacted into law. In my opinion that weakens and does not strengthen the sale of the bonds. Everybody knows that many of our good people who own farms, who are patriotic, mortgaged the farms or borrowed from the bank and bought bonds. They were patriotic and thought it was a fair investment, besides the bonds being nontaxable. They did not stop to ask about them, they knew that a bond is a bond and a dollar is a dollar. It is a bond of $100 whether it be in the hands of the rich man or the hands of the poor man. If it be at par it is worth 100 cents on the dollar. If it is only worth 94 cents on the dollar at 4½ per cent, I fear we will have trouble in putting them on the market. You endeavor to relieve them from that trouble by enabling those who own now, who can buy or borrow to purchase bonds at 4¼ per cent, and under the provisions of the proposed law a man can get $80,000 which he or his wife may have. There has not to be a good deal of gathering up before this will amount to a great deal.

We have had laws, if I read the history aright, in force in other nations in the world where they made it a criminal offense for anybody to refuse to receive the money of the country. And yet the money became absolutely worthless. You can not regulate these matters by compelling people to buy bonds or to sell bonds, but you can so legislate that the bonds, whether in the hands of the poor or the rich, are of equal value in the hands of either.

But you say we are never going to get out from under this load. Good Heavens! At the close of the Civil War the South was bankrupt, its notes worthless, its negro property gone, its land depreciated in value, its debts repudiated—never paid and never will be paid—its population poor; the North, with an enormous debt, with the soldiers to take care of, costing between five and six billion to care for them; and yet, in spite of all that, that thirty-one millions of population that we had has grown into 110,000,000 population and a great development has come, and we are worth, as the gentleman said a moment ago, two hundred and forty billions. One man in a speech the other day said that the wealth of the United States was $260,000,000,000. I am inclined to think that it is at least $240,000,000,000, as against the $16,000,000,000 we had at the close of the Civil War, with our great obligations.

As I have said before, we have just scratched this country. We have got to win out in this great contest to preserve our country and the freedom of our citizens. We have got to enable the citizen, whether he be rich or poor, to receive his reward for his labor; and the more efficient his labor is, the better for him. You have got to take care of the lunatics. Now, I am not getting personal as to some organization—I do not mean you Democrats in this country [laughter]—but we have got to take care of ourselves and then take care of them, rather than they take care of us. I honestly believe—and if I had the power I would enact the legislation—I would authorize the issue of these bonds at 3½ per cent interest, tax free from anybody, with the privilege of paying them in three or five years after the close of the war, so that if it was five years, with the privilege of paying them, in whole or in part, at any time in 50 years, I believe they would be at par; I believe they would be taken and always remain at par or at a premium, and if at a premium the bonds could be refunded at a lower rate of interest than 3½ per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] such time as he desires.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a few moments to say a word or two in supplement of what has been said by those favoring the passage of this bill. To my mind, it is wise legislation and its passage as speedily as possible is not only desirable but essential. No one, of course, will dispute the proposition that perhaps the most important thing that we have to do here in Congress is to see to it that the forthcoming liberty-bond issues are successful. At the very least we will have to finance the cost of the war during the current year twice as much by bonds as by taxation. At least two-thirds of the money must come from the sale of bonds. It is, therefore, in the highest degree essential that the next issue and other issues thereafter shall find a ready market. As I remember it, 4,000,000 people subscribed to the first liberty loan, 9,000,000 to the second, and 17,000,000 to the last, and it is my hope and my conviction that not less than 25,000,000 American citizens will subscribe to the forthcoming liberty loan. But, gentlemen, even if every one of 25,000,000 people bought a $100 liberty bond, we would have less than one-half of what it is necessary to raise. In other words, we must look less to the number of persons who are to buy these bonds than to their ability to buy them and their desirability as an investment. With the surtaxes as high as they are under the revenue bill which we are now considering it is, in my judgment, in the highest degree doubtful whether, without offering some added inducement to people of wealth or of a reasonable amount of wealth to buy these bonds, they will buy them. Had I been in the place of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] asked him the question whether this bill is in the interest of the rich man I would have frankly said yes. It is to this extent: It will be a greater temptation to a man who has to pay a high surtax to buy bonds if this bill is enacted than it will be a temptation to the poor man. That is true.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I did not raise the question with a view of criticizing the bill. I wanted simply to point out that it was necessary to do the very thing that we are doing, to offer an inducement so as to dispose of the bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Precisely. I understood the gentleman's position, and therefore I should have answered his question with frankness. It is necessary under existing conditions to offer a greater inducement to men of large means to buy these bonds than exists under the present law.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman believe that sufficient inducement is here offered, and that these bonds will sell even to the rich with this inducement?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman asks me a very difficult question.

Mr. TILSON. That is the thing that is bothering most of us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I admit to the gentleman that it is a guess entirely. If I had had my way, as I said in my speech the other day on the revenue bill, I would have cheerfully voted to exempt bonds forever from taxation to as high an amount as $25,000. This bill does not go so far as that. It exempts $30,000 plus $45,000 of bonds already issued and outstanding for two years after the war. That may or may not be sufficient inducement. My guess is that it will be.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Following up the question of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], it is the gentleman's belief that with the limitations of this bill there is a much better chance to sell $6,000,000,000 worth of bonds than there would be if we should not enact this measure?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is my deliberate judgment that if we do not enact this measure it will be difficult to sell the next issue of liberty bonds under the proposed system of high surtaxes in the revenue bill now under consideration.

Mr. SNYDER. That is exactly my judgment and the judgment of a great many men that I have talked to. Something like we are doing in this measure must be done in order to succeed in the sale of this next lot of bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I entirely agree with the gentleman that this measure is essential to the success of the coming liberty loan.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is not the proposition just this: We must either increase the rates of interest or offer an inducement.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is exactly the point I was coming to. Under existing conditions there are three ways of making the liberty bond more attractive as an investment than it now is. One is to raise the rate of interest, another is to raise the normal tax on incomes, and the other to proceed as we are doing in this bill and exempt bonds from taxation to a certain extent. I think it is universally agreed that it would be inadvisable at this time to increase the rate above 4¼ per cent. Of course, it is to the interest of this country to have the rate as low as possible, consistent with keeping the bonds somewhere near par, and providing a ready sale for them.

I listened with great attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on the question whether it would be wise to sell a 3½ per cent bond free of all taxation. I agreed with that view for some time, but the more I have thought it over the more I have become convinced that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is right when he says that it would be inadvisable to add very greatly to the amount of property of this country which is free from all taxation. Therefore, if we are to keep these bonds as the law now provides, at 4¼ per cent, subject to the surtax, we must do something to relieve them in some other way than adding to the rate of interest. In the new revenue bill, which is now before the House, we have gone some distance in the direction of making these bonds attractive by raising the normal tax from 4 per cent to 12 per cent. I would have been glad, as I stated the other day, to vote for a 15 per cent or even a little higher normal tax, because I think that would have had a very favorable effect upon the bond market. But as Congress has refused so far to go higher, at least as the revenue bill now before us carries a normal tax of only 12 per cent and very high surtaxes, I am convinced that the only thing to do is to proceed in the direction we are proceeding in this bill.

Now, gentlemen, the credit for this method of making attractive the sale of liberty bonds belongs, not to the Treasury Department, who has suggested it at this time, but to my very dear friend, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.] It was the gentleman from Illinois who offered the amendment to the last bond bill exempting $10,000 worth of bonds from taxation. The House in its wisdom cut that amount to $5,000, and now we are proposing in the line suggested by the gentleman from Illinois to raise that exemption to $30,000. It is the only way, gentlemen, we can make these bonds attractive, except by raising the rate of interest, or by raising the normal tax, and it is all we have before us to-day. I say unhesitatingly it is a thing that Congress should do, and as speedily as possible.

Mr. SNYDER. Suppose we should decide to raise the rate of interest. What effect does the gentleman think it would have upon the bonds already below par now?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, in the case of most of the bonds already issued provision is made that they may be converted into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

Mr. SNYDER. What would happen as to the loss that has already occurred on those bonds?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I assume that the bonds now outstanding would be immediately converted into those bearing the higher rate of interest, and it would have no effect.

Mr. PLATT. The last issue of bonds were unconvertible—the 4¼ per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is true; the gentleman is correct. It would rather tend to depreciate those bonds.

Mr. SNYDER. Exactly what I thought.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has any estimate been made by the Treasury officials as to the amount of taxes that will be exempt from taxation by exempting the bonds of the second, third, and fourth issues under the exemption provided in this bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I asked that exact question of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Leffingwell, and he said it was utterly impossible to estimate. In the first place no one can tell how these bonds may be distributed among the men paying high surtaxes, and for that and other reasons it was utterly impossible to estimate, but the Treasury Department believed that not much revenue will be lost. That, though, is a guess.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, every one will concede that some revenue will be lost, because undoubtedly a great amount of these bonds to-day are being held by persons in amounts above $5,000 which are liable to pay surtaxes, and they are going to be free from taxation during the period of the war and for two years thereafter. The very purpose of this bill is to free those bonds from the surtaxes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No one can tell just how many more bonds than the $30,000 will be bought.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the supposititious case suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is true that we are going to enable one and one-half times worth of other bonds to be exempted, why the total amount of prior issues might be thereby relieved from taxation; but, of course, that is a rash guess.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems certain some revenue will be lost, but the Treasury Department believes it will be comparatively insignificant.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Would the gentleman enlarge a little more fully on the second proposition in regard to the normal tax, as to how that would affect in the encouragement of the sale of the fourth loan?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Gladly. I suppose the gentleman understands these bonds are not subject to the normal tax but only to the surtax, and therefore it is axiomatic that the higher the normal tax and the less the surtax the more attractive the bond is to the man who has to pay the surtax. In England, for instance, I am told and believe, one of the reasons they have been so successful with their bond issues is that, having the same law we have providing that the income from bonds is subject to a surtax with a normal tax of 30 per cent and a maximum surtax of only about 50 per cent, their bonds are a very attractive investment to the man who is liable to the surtax.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the Treasury Department or anybody representing the Treasury suggest the embarrassment that the Treasury had in the competition they have encountered between Government bonds and the bonds of the Farm Loan Association? Those bonds bear a rate of 5½ per cent and are free from taxation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. So far as I know, no suggestion in that regard has been made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are selling now at about 6 per cent above par, the farm-loan bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are free from taxation, free of all taxation whatever, but of course technically they are not United States bonds; they are not Government bonds.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The advertisement of the association or the company that took over their sale says that they are being secured along with Government securities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Undoubtedly, but technically they are not Government bonds.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, did the Treasury Department indicate that they propose to ask for a modification of the law in respect to those bonds?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They did not, so far as I am advised

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. While the law stands as it does now they will be a more attractive bond than any other bond now issued by the Government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That might very well be. The same is true of certain classes of municipal bonds. That is one of the reasons why we have in the revenue bill provided, though I admit a doubt as to its constitutionality, for a tax on municipal bonds hereafter issued, because these municipal bonds to-day, not being subject to an income tax or to a surtax, may possess an undue advantage as compared with the obligations of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Was any effort made to work out in tabular form what 4 per cent or 4½ per cent would net to the high surtax payers, where the income tax is taxable over 50 per cent? Taking out the normal income, there will be cases, of course, where the bond would net only 2 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will have to answer the gentleman in this way: Under the law as it exists to-day, if I remember the figures correctly, and I calculated them myself, the 4¼ per cent bond will be worth no more than the 3½ per cent bond to the man who has an income of about $35,000.

Mr. PLATT. When you get above that——

Mr. LONGWORTH. When you get above $35,000 the 4¼ per cent bonds, as the income rises, become less valuable as an investment than the 3½ per cent bonds. That is the main reason that the 3½ to-day is at par and the 4¼ is below par.

Mr. PLATT. When you get into the higher brackets of the surtax, the municipal bonds that we have of 4 or 5 per cent are tax free, as compared with United States bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the law as it exists to-day, I imagine that a rich man with a million-dollar income would not net 2 per cent from the 4¼ bonds. I admit I am guessing, because I have not the figures before me. He can get 5 and 6 per cent from municipal bonds, and it is putting a pretty high tax on such a man's patriotism to ask him to buy very largely of liberty bonds.

Mr. PLATT. That is the whole question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When it is only looked upon from the investment side.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. How does the time stand as between the gentlemen? I understood the gentleman from North Carolina was entitled to one hour and the gentleman from Michigan to one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Michigan has not used his hour, and I asked him to permit me to yield 10 minutes, because we would save that much time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the bill and shall vote for it; but on the question that was raised this afternoon I should like to read an extract from the Federal Reserve Bulletin, which is published by the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington. The extract which I shall read is in the March issue, and it covers the question of foreign exchange. It says:

Proposals to have Federal reserve banks engage actively in foreign-exchange business at the present time, or to provide some other governmental mechanism for furnishing foreign exchange, have been under consideration during the past month, and the board has taken the view that such steps are not now advisable. It is further the opinion of the board that until the present abnormal conditions disappear it can not be determined precisely what machinery will be required with reference to the foreign-exchange problem beyond the facilities provided by existing banking arrangements. In times of peace the foreign-exchange business is highly competitive. Ordinarily in dealings between countries having a definitely established monetary standard there are no violent fluctuations in foreign-exchange rates, the controlling factors in adjusting balances being the ruling interest rates and the cost of shipping gold, the higher value of money attracting foreign funds into the debtor country for temporary or permanent investment, thereby obviating the necessity of sending gold. Just now, however, with the world at war, the foreign-exchange business is very much unsettled and is attended by great risks, because freedom in the operation of practically all the forces normally regulating foreign-exchance fluctuations has been eliminated. Embargoes on gold in force in practically all leading countries make it impossible to stabilize exchange rates in the ordinary manner through gold shipments, shipments of goods have been restricted to the minimum, and a free exchange of securities is hampered by apprehension on the part of the banks and the people, by political considerations, and by the wish of the investing classes to keep their savings at the disposal of their respective Governments.

It has been urged that American dollar exchange should not be at a discount in any country with which trade relations result in balances in favor of the United States; but it should be remembered that England, France, and Italy are buying heavily in neutral countries, and Great Britain is sustaining the price of sterling in New York by purchasing sterling bills in the New York market on a basis of 4.76⅞ for cables. This rate is about 2 per cent below the normal parity. It is obvious that with the rates of exchange between London and New York fairly well "stabilized," dollar exchange in neutral countries must move in harmony with the rates of exchange of sterling in neutral countries.

The discount to which the American dollar is subject in Spanish-speaking countries has been cited as the cause of loss to the United States. When, however, we recall that this country is selling to Spain more goods than it is buying from that country a different conclusion may be reached. While it may be felt that the prices on imported articles are increased through the rise of foreign exchange rates, such as within recent months has been characteristic of our trade with Spain, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, it must be conceded that if such be the case our export trade with these countries may profit in a corresponding way; and in many cases our exports exceed our imports. Consideration must be given also to the kinds and quantities of goods which enter into the establishment of the balance. For instance, comparative quotations in the Barcelona market, taken from the España Economica y Financiera, show that while in June, 1914, a 500-pound bale of American middling fair cotton could buy in Barcelona 126 gallons of Andalusian superior olive oil, it would buy 163 gallons of the same grade of oil in the same market early in November, 1917. Our cotton produced for us, therefore, a relatively larger purchasing power than the sale of an equal amount would have yielded in former years. It resulted in a greater credit balance than in the past, and this balance, to the extent that it was not settled in goods, was paid us by Spain in foreign exchanges, such as sterling and francs, which we purchased at a discount larger than that affecting the dollar, so that the nominal loss on the American dollar did not hurt our purchasing power in trade with Spain or the interests of our country as a whole.

And what is true of cotton, used as an illustration, is true of any other article that we export. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Federal Reserve Board took that position at that time. That was the position of Gov. Harding when he appeared before the committee in consideration of the Owen bill, which is a different proposition from the one in this bill. This bill does not propose to let the Federal Reserve Board require the Federal reserve banks to do anything or give the Federal Reserve Board authority, but gives the whole authority to the Secretary of the Treasury. If the Secretary of the Treasury is willing to take it, I am willing as I have comfidence in both his ability and integrity. We have already made arrangements through the State Department with Argentina by which Argentina undertakes to settle the bills we owe to merchants in Argentina by paying the money to the Argentine ambassador, and he, in turn, under that agreement deposits it with the Federal reserve bank in New York and gets a gold credit, with the pledge of Argentina that she will not remove that gold until after the war is over.

Gov. Harding advises me this afternoon that he approves the pending provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WINGO. I wish I could yield to the gentleman, but my time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That until the expiration of two years after the date of the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, fixed by proclamation of the President—

(1) The interest on an amount of bonds of the fourth liberty loan the principal of which does not exceed $30,000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from graduated additional income taxes, commonly known s surtaxes, and excess-profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations;

(2) The interest received after January 1, 1918, on an amount of bonds of the first liberty loan converted, dated either November 15, 1917, or May 9, 1918, the second liberty loan, converted and unconverted, and the third liberty loan, the principal of which does not exceed $45,000 in the aggregate, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, shall be exempt from such taxes: Provided, however, That no owner of such bonds shall be entitled to such exemption in respect to the interest on an aggregate principal amount of such bonds exceeding one and one-half times the principal amount of bonds of the fourth liberty loan originally subscribed for by such owner and still owned by him at the date of his tax return; and

(3) The interest on an amount of bonds, the principal of which does not exceed $30,000, owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, issued upon conversion of 3½ per cent bonds of the first liberty loan in the exercise of any privilege arising as a consequence of the issue of bonds of the fourth liberty loan, shall be exempt from such taxes.

The exemptions provided in this section shall be in addition to the exemption provided in section 7 of the second liberty-bond act in respect to the interest on an amount of bonds and certificates, authorized by such act and amendments thereto, the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000, and in addition to all other exemptions provided in the second liberty-bond act.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 1, line 5, after the word "Government" and the comma, insert the word "as."

Mr. KITCHIN. So that it will read, "as fixed by proclamation of the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think that the provisions of this section will stimulate the purchase of bonds to a considerable degree among those who are able to purchase an amount which will add to their surtax. The members of the committee will observe that the benefits of this exemption are only given to those who purchase a certain portion of the fourth liberty loan. It will tend to stimulate purchases of the fourth loan by making exempt not only the portion of that loan that is so purchased, but also one and a half times that amount of other bonds that have been purchased of the liberty loans.

There is one provision in the new revenue bill which I think will tend to stimulate the purchase of bonds which has not been noticed in the discussion thus far. The bonds issued since the first liberty loan are subject to the surtax and also to the excess-profits tax and war-profits tax, as provided by the terms of the second liberty loan act. Under the new revenue bill individuals and copartnerships are taken out from under the excess-profits taxes. If this provision is kept in the bill—and I think it will be when it goes on from this body to another body—the effect will be to exempt all Government bonds from excess-profits taxes, except those held by corporations—and very few are so held. Of course, the amount of excess-profits taxes which could be levied against them when held by individuals could not be very large in any event, but this provision seems to have troubled a good many parties in buying liberty bonds, and I think that incidentally the effect of the provisions of the revenue bill will be favorable in that direction.

After all, the real instrumentality, the real moving purpose in buying these bonds, must be the patriotism of the party who is buying them. If he is a wealthy man, his surtax will run up to an extent that will cause, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] stated, a very low rate of income from the bond. If he is a comparatively poor man, a man of small means, in 9 cases out of 10—I might say 99 out of 100—he has places where he can use the money so that it will bring on a greater amount of interest, and he gets no benefit from any exemptions, because his property would not be large enough to make it subject to any taxes in any event.

The American people, however, have shown by the gradually increasing number of purchasers that the patriotism of the country is rising to meet the emergency that confronts us. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there will be no trouble in marketing the next issue of liberty bonds—the fourth issue. I am sure that, so far as my own State is concerned, the amount allotted to it will be subscribed and even oversubscribed, and I do not believe that there will be a failure in any part of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 6 of the second liberty-bond act is hereby amended by striking out the figures "$2,000,000,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$4,000,000,000." Such section is further amended by striking out the words "and it shall not be lawful for any one person at any one time to hold war-savings certificates to an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and it shall not be lawful for any one person at any one time to hold war-savings certificates of any one series to an aggregate amount exceeding $1,000."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 2. I did not notice that the Clerk had read past that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has an amendment to section 2.

Mr. PLATT. I think this amendment will be accepted by the committee.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman had better ask unanimous consent to go back.

Mr. PLATT. I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to go back to section 2. I think it is an amendment which the committee will accept.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let it be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 3, line 12, insert after the quotation marks and before the word "and" the following: "The amount of war-savings certificates sold to any one person at any one time shall not exceed $100" and a comma.

Mr. KITCHIN. You strike that out in the old law?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. Include that in the words stricken out.

I will say in relation to that, Mr. Chairman, that the prohibition of the purchase of more than $100 worth of these war savings certificates at one time seems to be a dead letter. People are subscribing for $1,000 worth at once, and no effort is being made to stop it. In fact, it seems rather to be encouraged. I understand that the President of the United States took $1,000 worth, or at least subscribed for them, at one time, thereby apparently violating this provision of the law. Why have something in the law that nobody pays any attention to? I understand the Treasury Department has no objection to these words going out.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me examine that a moment. I think the gentleman has it all right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Right in line with the gentleman's remarks I want to say that out in my own State, where they apportion an amount that each community ought to take, a great many people were notified that their share was $200 or $500 or more, and they took that amount.

Mr. PLATT. Exactly. The war savings committees apportioned $200 or $500 or more, and the people took them all at once, in spite of the fact that the law says that not more than $100 worth shall be taken by one person at one time. Why have that prohibition in the law when it serves no good purpose and nobody pays any attention to it? No penalty is provided for its violation.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Did we not amend the law by taking off the limit in the amount of war savings certificates that could be bought?

Mr. PLATT. I called attention to the matter when the last liberty loan bill was under consideration, but I do not think anything was done about it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Would it not be well to postpone this until the end of the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. I understand the Secretary of the Treasury has no objection to these words going out. I think I may say that Assistant Secretary Leffingwell has been consulted with regard to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think this is all right. I think this is what was intended, anyway, by the act, by this new amendment here to the proposed bill. Under the existing law, as the gentleman from New York has explained, they can not buy to exceed $100 worth at one time.

Now, this is to eliminate that and let them buy up to $1,000 at one time, if they desire to. I see no objection to it. I think it is all right. The gentleman proposes to follow that with another amendment, does he not?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. The other amendment is at the Clerk's desk. It merely changes a word or two to complete the sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. Consent to return has not yet been granted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] to section 2.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May the amendment be reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 3, line 12, insert after the quotation mark and before the word "and" the following: "The amount of war-saving certificates sold to any one person at any one time shall not exceed $100," and strike out the comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I offer another amendment, simply to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 3, line 15, strike out the words "and it" and insert in lieu thereof the word "It."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury may make arrangements in or with foreign countries to stabilize the foreign exchanges and to obtain foreign currencies and credits in such currencies, and he may use any such credits and foreign currencies for the purpose of stabilizing or rectifying the foreign exchanges, and he may designate depositaries in foreign countries with which may be deposited as he may determine all or any part of the avails of any foreign credits or foreign currencies.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McFADDEN: Page 3, line 23, strike out section 4.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 23, after the word "may" insert "during the war and for two years after its termination."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I have followed the discussion on this mooted section, it is generally agreed that the Federal Reserve Board to-day have authority to stabilize exchange, but for some reason good to themselves they have not seen fit to exercise that authority. The Secretary of the Treasury now wishes to exercise this authority. We all agree that it is a very drastic power, that should be exercised only if the conditions are exigent. If those conditions require the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise it during the war, I then believe the limitation carried in the amendment which I have offered should be agreed to. I ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] whether there can be any good reason for opposing this amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I see no objection to the amendment. If, as the gentleman says, the Federal Reserve Board now have that power, of course it was given for them to exercise in time of peace. This is a war measure, so far as this provision is concerned, and therefore I see no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to strike out section 4, because it has no place in this bill. The reasons that have been presented in this discussion to-day for this special section are not convincing to me, to show why it should be added to this important bill. This is a supplement to the second liberty-loan act. I remember well, when the last liberty-loan act was presented here, that it was also encumbered with a certain section recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury that had been turned down by the proper committee of this House. That section was presented to the Ways and Means Committee as a new section of that bill. After considerable discussion on the floor of this House it was modified, and afterwards when the conference report came in it was stricken out of the bill. I refer to the section exempting national banks from taxation, providing they held Government bonds. Here we have a duplication of this again. We have an attempt on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to avoid the proper consideration of an important section by attaching it to a bill which has not been given the special consideration that it would have received if it had been referred to the proper committee. In confirmation of that I only need to mention the remarks of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee [Mr. GLASS] this morning. It seems to me that an important matter like this, when it can not be shown or proven that it is a war-emergency legislation, should not be added to this important measure. I want to enter my protest against it, and I believe it should have more deliberation on the part of this House; because, after listening to the discussion here to-day, I do not believe that any Member on the floor of this House is competent to pass on section 4 at this time. That is my reason for offering this amendment to strike out the section. Section 6 is a repetition—it amends section 5200 of the Revised Statutes—and was reported out of Banking and Currency Committee of this House and passed last April. It is now held up in the Senate Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. DENISON. Why did not the gentleman make a point of order against it and get it out in that way? It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. McFADDEN. I have offered my amendment in place of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the section.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Too late!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That clause (b) of section 5 of the trading-with-the-enemy act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and he may require any such person engaged in any such transaction to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters or other papers, in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed."

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 10, after the word "investigate," strike out the comma and insert the word "and"; also, strike out the words "or prohibit."

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been fully discussed. I am opposed, in a bill of this kind, when we are trying to encourage the sale of bonds, to giving any man in the country power to prohibit the transfer of bonds after they are sold. I do not think such a power should be granted. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said that it would not be exercised if granted, but I think the power ought not to be conferred and it should be stricken from the bill. I think if we give the President the power to regulate, that that term is broad enough to include every power necessary to be exercised by him.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I sympathize with the view and the effort which the gentleman is making, but I think he is accomplishing more than he intends to accomplish. He does not desire to prevent the hoarding or melting of bullion. This is to amend the trading-with-the-enemy act, and the only difference in language is "or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States."

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit, if the gentleman would change his amendment so that in lines 13 and 14 he strikes out the words "or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States," and then down in line 22, after the words "United States," insert "and may investigate and regulate by means of license or transfers all bonds and certificates of indebtedness," it would leave the trading-with-the-enemy act as it is, and would only give the President power to regulate and investigate transactions as to bonds and certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I want to do.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, is the point of order to the section in order now, or is it too late?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to say that I think somebody ought to have made the point of order that this section has reference to the trading-with-the-enemy act, and that this bill proposes an amendment that has nothing to do with trading with the enemy.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment and return to the section and present it later.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; let us have a vote on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DENISON. I think my amendment is too broad and does not cover exactly what I mean.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then let the gentleman withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I have offered in order that one may be offered which will present my ideas in better form.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman withdrawing the amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 7, to page 5, to line 3, inclusive, strike out section 5.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, the only new language in this section are the words "or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States," the evident purpose being to reenact the provision "b," containing the trading-with-the-enemy act, with those words added. Those are the words that it seems to me are bestowing on the President a very extraordinary power.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that the words "hoarding or melting" are also included in the new language.

Mr. HAYES. I looked it over very hastily.

Mr. WALSH. I have compared it, and that is the fact.

Mr. HAYES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment, to strike out the words "or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the terms the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. HAYES: Page 4, line 13, after the word "exchange," strike out the words "or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States."

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I presume that all gentlemen who are considering this subject will agree that section 5 of this bill is a very extraordinary grant of power. It means almost a confiscation, if it should be exercised, of the property of the citizen; it could not be sold, could not be realized upon, could not be disposed of in a commercial sense.

In spirit at least, in my judgment, it is a violation of that provision of the Constitution which guarantees that the people shall be inviolate in their property rights. I can not bring myself to believe that a provision of this kind is necessary. It seems to me that it is to the interest of all of the people at this time that these bonds shall find the largest possible market, and if there are abuses that have grown up they can be corrected in some other way than this. As I am advised, no one of the allied countries has granted any such power or exercises it. No such law as this can be found upon the statute books of any of them. Canada, to which reference has been made, unless I am misinformed, regulates these abuses by rules of the stock exchanges in which the bonds are offered for sale. We can do the same thing, or, if we can not, let us pass some regulation, so that when they are offered these abuses may be corrected as the bonds are offered in the stock exchange, and not bestow this tremendous power upon anyone to prevent the sale of the property of the citizens of the United States at this time, especially to prevent sales so that a man who buys bonds can not realize upon them when he needs the money for other purposes.

So far as I am concerned, I want to fix it so that everybody who has a dollar can invest it in the securities of the United States to help carry on this war. I do not want to fix it so that the man who has his money invested in business can not buy the securities of the United States with perfect safety, knowing that he can sell them when he wants to. I happen to be associated in a business where in six months' time the product of the business has to be handled because it is all shipped by the Great Lakes, and as a result when fall comes we not only have all of the money in the business in the product shipped, but we sometimes have all that we can borrow as well. I should like to be in a position where I could next spring, if there comes another bond issue, buy a large amount of these bonds; but unless I could be assured that when fall comes I can dispose of the bonds if I desire to, if my bank will not loan money upon them, I could not buy them. What is my situation is the situation of a great many business men in the United States. They have their money invested in business and it is necessary for them to have it when they need it. Men have to be paid, freight has to be paid, other expenses must be met or the business stops. If they can not have the right to sell their property and realize upon it when they need the money they can not afford to take the chance. That is the situation. I am speaking from knowledge and not from theory in this matter. I feel, as I said before, that what is my situation is the situation of many other business men of the United States, and I can see no reason for the insertion of this extraordinary provision in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 42, noes 36.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. FOSTER and Mr. HAYES to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the short title of this act shall be "Supplement to second liberty-bond act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina a question respecting section 7. What is the reason why this bill, with a lot of extraneous provisions in it, having nothing whatever to do with the second liberty-bond act, should be called a supplement to the second liberty-bond act? It is true that the second liberty-bond act did have some provisions in it fixing the rate of interest on the bonds which should be exempted from taxation. This bill in its entirety can not properly be called a supplement to the second liberty-bond act. It is a bill that ought to stand separately, and it seems to me that it would be a mistake for the House to pass this measure and confer upon it that title. I would ask the chairman of the committee the reason for adopting section 7.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had read fully the title——

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I have read it. It says "and for other purposes."

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it says "to supplement the second liberty-bond act as amended, and for other purposes."

Mr. WALSH. But I am not talking about the title. I am talking about section 7.

Mr. KITCHIN. The reason for section 7 is that when we refer to this act we would refer to it as the supplement of the second liberty-bond act. It is a supplement in aid of bonds authorized under the second liberty-bond act as amended.

Mr. WALSH. And, of course, it is also to aid in the sale of bonds under the fourth liberty-bond act.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that is in the second liberty-bond act as amended.

Mr. WALSH. The very first section of the bill shows that this is in aid of this bond issue that is now pending, the fourth loan.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the fifth loan and the sixth loan.

Mr. WALSH. That is all the more reason, then, why it should not be called the second liberty loan, supplementary.

Mr. KITCHIN. Because all of these bonds, until we have another bond authorization, are issued and sold under the second liberty-bond act as amended by the other acts. I think the gentleman will find no trouble about that.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. There will be no further legislation required for putting into operation the fourth liberty loan?

Mr. KITCHIN. For this liberty loan?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman tell me whether the Secretary of the Treasury has made the full report which we have been so often promised about the expenses of the last liberty loan act?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand he has made two reports. I have not been able to look over them, but I will hand them to the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. Are they as full and as much in detail as anticipated?

Mr. KITCHIN. The second one seems to be fuller in details than the first.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman hold it in his hand?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have it here. Just pass it over to the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think he has made such a report as the House is entitled to, considering the enormous sums which we have given for this purpose and the absolute power that goes with? Does not the gentleman think we ought to have a detailed report, such a detailed report as the law requires?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say I have not had time to look over that report——

Mr. GILLETT. It will not take long. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I observe it is very fine print, sir. I think the Secretary of the Treasury thought it sufficient to cover the request of the House, the direction of the House, otherwise he would not have made it. I ask the gentleman to look it over himself before he comments on it, and then give his opinion if it does not cover everything he wanted it to cover, and if not, in what respect it is lacking.

Mr. GILLETT. I look it over now, and it seems to me it gives about the same amount of information which the previous report did, which, in my opinion, did not——

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman look at it again? The gentleman can not tell a single item of it, for he has not examined it.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think I can remember every word. I seriously think, Mr. Chairman, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in good faith to the Congress, which gives ungrudgingly these enormous powers to him, ought to give a more full and detailed account by which we can know, if we have the curiosity, how the money was spent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I agree with the gentleman that if it does not give full information, it ought to be fuller; that if it does not give the details sufficiently to show how the expenditures were made, it ought to go into greater detail; but I really have not seen it.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman have that report inserted in the RECORD for information?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent, just before adjourning, to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina give attention for a moment? There was some understanding about an amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]. The Chair had the impression that the amendment has been superseded by that offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my understanding, that the gentleman from Illinois withdrew his amendment in order to perfect it, and, as I understand, the amendment of the gentleman from California covered the very proposition the gentleman had in his mind or had suggested.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California as adopted by the committee be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from California went further evidently than the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would go, and I think that the amendment the gentleman from Illinois offered was much——

Mr. KITCHIN. But the gentleman from Illinois should have amended the amendment of the gentleman from California and put it in his, because if we now put in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois it would be inconsistent with the amendment which the committee has adopted.

Mr. DENISON. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman from Illinois asked unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], as the Chair remembers it, asked unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, with the privilege of offering it later.

Mr. HAYES. There is nothing before the committee, evidently.

Mr. DENISON. I will state to the Chairman that I intended to offer an amendment later, but when the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] was offered and carried it virtually took the place of the amendment I intended to offer.

Mr. KITCHIN. Your amendment would be absolutely inconsistent with the amendment offered by the gentleman before that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SLAYDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask, while I have the right, for 10 minutes under this.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that request——

Mr. KITCHIN. And then I shall ask for the previous question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8004. An act authorizing the resurvey or retracement of lands heretofore returned as surveyed public lands of the United States under certain conditions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COOPER of Ohio, indefinitely, on account of sickness; and

To Mr. ALMON, indefinitely, on account of important official business.

LIBERTY BONDS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I hope I will be pardoned for calling attention to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] which the Committee of the Whole House a few moments ago adopted. I am sure that the committee did not understand the amendment and did not intend for it to have the effect that it will have.

I know that the Treasury Department thinks it is very essential for the protection of the bondholders, the little ones as well as the big ones, but especially the little ones, and to make the sale of the fourth liberty bonds as easy and as complete as possible, for the President to have the power to investigate, regulate, or prohibit in extreme cases, under such regulations as he may determine, the sale and transfer of Government bonds and certificates of indebtedness. Such power is in the bill. The amendment of the gentleman from California strikes it out. With this amendment there will be no power in this Government, in either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury, to regulate the sale and transfer of these bonds. There will be no power in the President or the Secretary to even investigate the sale and transfer and trafficking in liberty bonds and certificates of indebtedness. There will be no power in the President or Secretary to prohibit the doubtful manipulation, trafficking, and trading in our liberty bonds and certificates of indebtedness to which the Government must resort to support the war.

I want to say to the House that there are manipulations and transactions, which I felt I was not at liberty to disclose, that, in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of every man in this House, ought to be absolutely prohibited; but with this amendment in the Government—the Commander in Chief—is powerless to interfere. There are syndicates, little bodies of men, here and there throughout the United States, of which the Treasury Department is cognizant, and of which some men in this House are cognizant, that are attempting and conspiring to depreciate in the market liberty bonds, buying up the little bonds—the $50, the $100, and $500 and $1,000 bonds—for the purpose of dumping them on the open market, even at a lower price than they paid for them. For what purpose? To push down the market value of the bonds now outstanding in order to force the Government to put the interest rate up to 5 or 6 per cent on new issues of bonds; and this will, of course, compel the Government to advance the interest on all the billions of dollars of bonds already issued to the higher rate.

I am as jealous as any man in this House of reserving all the rights and power of the people and of Congress, and not giving away to the President or to anyone a jot or tittle unless I am convinced it is absolutely necessary. And I want to say right here, Democrat as I am, a partisan Democrat as I am, that since April 6, 1917, not a partisan utterance has ever escaped my lips, because not a partisan feeling or sentiment has been in my heart since; and I hope to keep such a feeling and sentiment from my heart and lips until we win this war and drive German militarism from the face of the earth. [Applause.] I say, Democrat as I am and as I have been, I am no more willing to give up the powers of Congress and the rights of the people to a Democratic President than I would to a Republican President.

I do not think a Democratic President should have a bit more power, or a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury should have a bit more power, than a Republican President or a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, and I would give to a Republican President and a Republican Secretary of the Treasury the same powers to prosecute this war as I would a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury. I believe that if Charles E. Hughes were President now, and whoever he might have appointed were Secretary of the Treasury, he would have shown, both would have shown, the same loyalty and patriotism and Americanism as Woodrow Wilson and Secretary McAdoo have shown. [Applause.]

But, hesitating as I do to give any President the powers we are giving to him, and hesitating as I did with respect to giving him the vaster powers that we have heretofore given him in other bills, I believe, gentlemen, that after conferring with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary before I made my talk to-day and with Mr. Leffingwell, the Assistant Secretary, since it is essential for the protection of the small bondholders, who hold bonds to the amount of billions, and essential in facilitating the sale of future bonds, that the President should have the power to investigate, to regulate, and to prohibit the sale and transfer and manipulation and traffic in Government bonds and certificates of indebtedness whenever he thinks it to the interest of the Government and the people. I give it reluctantly. Ah, I have as you have voted for many bills that gave the President unheard-of power, with much hesitation, with much reluctance, and every man who voted for the Hayes amendment to take this power from the President has voted far vaster, more absolute powers to the President than does this bill. We intrusted such powers to him in the convictions that they were necessary for the proper prosecution of the war and that he would use them for such purpose, which he has faithfully done. Why, my friends, every man in this House voted to give the President power over all the railroads in the United States, the power of life and death over every industry of the United States under the provisions in the railroad act.

We gave him the power to destroy the commerce of the United States and of the world if he were unwise enough, unpatriotic enough, unjust enough to exercise to the limit such powers. By our vote we gave him the power to prohibit the import or export of a single article to or from the shores of the United States. Our foreign trade now amounts annually to over $8,000,000,000; our imports are over $2,000,000,000. We exported last year $6,000,000,000 of the products of our mines and fields and factories throughout the world. And yet the President was given the power, by your vote and mine, to prohibit the exportation of a single penny's worth of our products; to prohibit the exportation of a bale of cotton; to prohibit the exportation of a barrel of flour, a pound of meat, or a bushel of wheat. We gave him the power to prohibit the exportation of a dollar's worth of the products of American factories, to stop every dollar of the billions we are now exporting. We did not then attempt to put an obstacle in the way of the passage of such bills by intimating that the President might be so unwise and so unpatriotic and so disloyal to his own country and his own people as by the improper exercise of such powers to destroy the commerce and industry of this country.

More, the men in this House and the men who voted for the Hayes amendment in the Committee of the Whole House, on both sides, have boasted, and properly and rightly boasted, that they have voted for the draft and other war measures of the administration which put the liberty and life and death, the flesh and blood and bones, of 23,000,000 free American citizens absolutely in the hands of the President, without flinching. [Applause.]

We gave to the President the power to order our millions of brave boys to cross the ocean in paddling canoes. We gave him the power to order our soldiers to attack German trenches with only their bare hands and arms. We knew then and we know now that no such power would ever be exercised. We put it in his power to send to foreign lands 2,000,000 or 10,000,000 or 20,000,000 men. We put it in his power to take the business, the career, the liberty, the lives away from 23,000,000 of our fellow men. But now, when it comes down to regulating or prohibiting the improper trading and trafficking in the bonds the issues of which are absolutely necessary to sustain the millions of boys we must send to the front, men in this House vote to strike out this provision, because the President of the United States, in whose hands you have given these vast, unheard-of powers, unparalleled in all the annals of mankind, can not now be trusted by wise and proper orders and regulations to protect the small bondholders or to help to sell the new issues of bonds, for fear that the President may by some order affect a few dollars and cents of some bondholder. Gentlemen are willing to give him absolute power over the flesh and blood and bones of millions of our fellow citizens, but unwilling to give him the least power over the manipulating and trafficking of a few conspiring bondholders. Gentlemen, as I said at first and as you know, I would be the last man in this House to give that power were I not convinced that it was proper and wise. I had doubts about it, as does the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], who, as we all know, is as intensely loyal and patriotic as any man in this Capitol, until I had fully considered it and ascertained the facts and conditions which fully justify it. Then I decided to do what I am going to do, to vote against the Hayes amendment, and place in the President's hands that power, in the confidence and assurance that he will use it not to injure a single man, woman, or child who owns a bond or even a thrift stamp; in the confidence and assurance that the power and discretion we are giving him will be used by him to protect the men, women, and children who now own and those who will buy the liberty bonds of our Nation, and to facilitate the sale of future issues. I am going to vote to strike the Hayes amendment from the bill, and I trust the gentleman from California and other gentlemen of the House can vote with me. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes, or whatever time I had, and then I will demand the previous question.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] did not make the speech to which we have just listened before we had the vote in Committee of the Whole on the amendment.

While the bill has been under consideration I have tried repeatedly to have the gentleman state some reason why this provision should be in this bill. He failed to state any. I have not found anywhere in the record of the hearings that the Secretary of the Treasury has asked for any such provision. Still less have I found any reason for asking it, and I think we are entitled to have the reasons for it if there are any. The gentleman from North Carolina will not go one step further than I will go in granting to the President of the United States the powers necessary to win this war, no matter what those powers may be. [Applause.] As the gentleman has stated, I have voted with other Members of this House to grant very much larger powers than this bill grants to the President of the United States, and I presume I shall do it again; but I will say to you frankly that I want to be satisfied that such a power is necessary for the prosecution of the war before I vote to give it. Remember that we are voting to bestow upon the President and other executive officers authority that has belonged to the Congress of the United States for 129 years. I have done it, I am willing to do it again, but I want to have somebody satisfy me that it is necessary that we do it before I do it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the amendment to this bill to which the gentleman from North Carolina refers was not offered nor urged in any partisan spirit. Every Member of this House will bear me out in the statement that since I have been a Member I have never permitted partisanship to enter into the consideration of any such financial or business proposition as this—never. The members of the Committee on Banking and Currency will, I am sure, all agree that in the committee, in the consideration of the subjects that have come before us, I never permit partisanship to interfere with my judgment or action as a member of that committee; and at this time, when every American ought to be behind the flag and doing everything he can to see to it that it is carried to victory by our soldiers, it would be the last time in the world when I would think of taking a partisan position on a thing of this kind.

I had no partisan purpose when I offered the amendment, and the gentlemen who voted for it have done so free from partisan considerations. So far as I am concerned, the thing I object to is giving anybody the privilege of prohibiting the sale of these bonds, not, as I explained, because I distrust the President of the United States, not because I am afraid to trust him with responsibility and the judgment to exercise it—I explained explicitly that that was not what prompted me, but it was because I feared that if the provision was in the bill it would interfere with the sale of the bonds. If the gentleman will give us assurances that the power will never be exercised, I might be willing to take them and grant this power, although I must say that my reason is not satisfied. I do not see why it is necessary to give power to prohibit the sale of bonds, but I certainly do not wish to interfere with the sale of the bonds or the prosecution of the war. The thing that all of us had in view was, I am sure, to facilitate the sale of the bonds rather than to hamper and interfere with it.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I was favorably impressed and voted for the report of the committee, but the discussion on the floor of the House and in committee convinced me that it was unwise and that the amendment of the gentleman from California was absolutely sound. The bill provides, among other things, that a large increase of loans may be made by every national banking institution in the United States secured by Government bonds. That being the security, what assurance is there that the banks in a strait could obtain money on any of its loans if in advance there stands the power of prohibition by any power in America to prevent those bonds held as collateral security from being sold and realized upon.

Mr. HAYES. I was going to state that, but the gentleman has taken the words out of my mouth. In my judgment, not only will this provision interfere with the sale of the bonds, but it will interfere with the banks handling them, as they have heretofore, for the reason that the gentleman has stated. A bank would not be justified in taking collateral unless it can go upon the market and sell it freely when necessary. All of these considerations move me to believe that the gentleman from North Carolina is mistaken in this matter. I have not seen any request from the Secretary of the Treasury for this legislation, and he is primarily responsible for the sale of these bonds. I have not heard any argument from anybody that satisfies me that it is necessary. If anybody can satisfy me that it is necessary or even that it will not injure the sale of the bonds, my principal objection to the provision will be gone.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A case came under my observation within three days which may show the importance of this, although it is a comparatively small matter. A man in this town carried a deposit in a bank, and through an error on the part of the bank clerk at the time when he asked for his balance they reported a balance. When the man came to settle, instead of having $1,300 balance, as they reported, he had $1,300 overdraft. The bank having made the mistake was very anxious to secure it, and the only collateral the man had was liberty bonds. He said, "If I had known my condition, I would not have taken so many bonds, and now you must buy them." In that way it was settled. That might happen on a larger scale, where a man was doing business with thousands and thousands of dollars.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will notice, and I think the House ought to know, that this is not an absolute prohibition of the sale of bonds and not so intended. It gives the President the power, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. That is, certain regulations may be prescribed fixing certain circumstances, and I think everyone will agree that there will be circumstances under which the sale of bonds ought to be forbidden. I will say, further, that the suggestion came from the Treasury.

Mr. HAYES. Oh, we had not been advised of that before. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will let the matter go over until tomorrow, when we may see if we can not arrive at an agreement that will be satisfactory to us all. I have no objection to a provision permitting the President of the United States to regulate the sale of the bonds, but I believe my objection is sound that if we put in this provision permitting anybody to prohibit the sale of bonds it will seriously interfere with their sale.

Mr. SNYDER. I wonder if the gentleman did not overlook the fact that this bill is to facilitate the Government in the sale of bonds and not the individual.

Mr. HAYES. Surely I have not overlooked that fact. That is the very crux of the situation.

Mr. SNYDER. It is my understanding that we are enacting a law here for the purpose of assisting the Government in selling this vast amount of bonds.

Mr. HAYES. Absolutely.

Mr. SNYDER. And we are not particularly interested in how it affects the sale by the individual.

Mr. HAYES. No; but if I as an individual have money that I can put into bonds, I am not going to put it in unless I can be pretty well assured that I shall be able to get it out if I need it, especially if I am a business man. Therefore, I suggest that this provision will make it very much harder, in many cases impossible, for a man to buy bonds. As I explained in the discussion of the amendment, I am in a position where at certain times in the year I need money and at certain other times I do not. At those times when I do not need my money I might be able to buy bonds, if I am assured that when the time comes that I do need it I can realize on those bonds.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. I demand a separate vote upon the Hayes amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on the other amendments? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Hayes amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Hayes amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAYES) there were—ayes 31, noes 116.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. RAKER (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAYES) there were—ayes 149, noes 0.

So the bill was unanimously passed.

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith for printing under the rules conference reports upon bills S. 4543, 4722, and 4194, of similar title, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of said soldiers and sailors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the reply of Secretary Tumulty to the reply of Mr. Will H. Hays, as printed in the RECORD of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the water-power bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the water-power bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a proposed draft of a bill to include both midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy and cadets at the United States Military Academy within certain provisions of the war-risk insurance act of September 2, 1914, as amended by the act of October 6, 1917, and subsequent enactments (H. Doc. No. 1274); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting proposed draft of bill for the relief of Forest R. Black, Naval Reserve Force (H. Doc. No. 1275); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 12934) to extend certain provisions of the war-risk insurance act of September 2, 1914, as amended to cadets at the United States Military Academy and Midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 12935) to extend the statute of limitations in certain criminal cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Lyon, Conklin & Co. (Inc.), suggesting an amendment to the new revenue bill allowing a reserve of price inventory; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Resolutions of the State Council of Defense, of Connecticut, for peace with victory, and complimenting the troops of the allies and of Gen. Pershing on their heroism; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TAGUE: Telegraphic petition from wholesale dry goods dealers of Boston regarding House bill 12863; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 14, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, we would draw near to Thee, that by the touch of purity we may be lifted out of the petty in life into the eternal verities; that politics as such may be lost in patriotism; sectarianism, in pure religion; race prejudice, in fraternity; social distinctions, in nobility of soul; selfishness, in sacrifice; doubt, in faith; despair, in hope; hate, in love; war, in peace; that all things may work together for good. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KEHOE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for the day, on account of official business.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Friday the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent that on next Friday, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INCREASE OF PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill touching the increase of pay of certain officers in the Army, and I have a little memorandum, which is very short, showing the necessity for it, which I would like to insert in the RECORD, and I ask uanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the memorandum referred to:

SEPTEMBER 7, 1918.

Memorandum in connection with bill introduced by Representative DYER in the House of Representatives August 31, 1918, and known as House bill 12852, providing for a $500 annual increase in the pay of Army officers from the rank of second lieutenant to colonel, inclusive.

In 1908 Congress increased the pay of Army officers and enlisted men because of the increased cost of living. In 1917 Congress doubled the pay of enlisted men of the Army, but in this enactment failed to consider the increased cost of living during the past 10 years as it affected the commissioned officers. At the same time for the same reason the pay of commissioned officers of the Army should have been increased. No increase has been made in officers' pay, and on account of the war and disturbed economical conditions in the United States officers have been confronted almost monthly with soaring prices on food, clothing, and equipment with which they must provide themselves and families. Profiteers have taken advantage of their needs and demanded and received their pound of flesh.

Since 1908, the date of the last increase in the pay of Army officers, the cost of food, clothing, and equipment has increased generally from 70 per cent to 290 per cent, as shown by the following comparison between wholesale market prices of food products and wearing apparel 10 years ago and those of to-day.

3. As shown by the above statement, the general average of increase during the past 10 years on standard articles of food and clothing is approximately 160 per cent, and during that time the general purchasing value of $1 has shrunk to 55 cents, but the pay of the Army officer has remained stationary and immovable. During this period he has witnessed substantial increases in the pay of officials and employees in the civil branches of the Government, in the State and municipal governments, in the railroad corporations, in the steel and iron corporations, and generally in all the enterprises of the industrial world. It was necessary to increase the pay of these employees and officials in order that they might keep abreast of the increased cost of ordinary living expenses. The Army officer, who has been at a disadvantage in this respect, does not even now ask for an increase in pay, but it is the duty of the Nation, as represented by Congress, to see that his pay is equitable and commensurate with the pay of officials of like standing and responsibility in the business world and sufficient to enable him to maintain the standard of living which is expected and required of him in his official capacity, without the necessity of incurring debts and consequent worry as to the needs and welfare of his family while doing his share in the fight for the freedom of mankind.

4. On account of the heavy outlay that an officer must make at the present time for uniforms and equipment and the small base pay of an officer of the rank of lieutenant or captain many officers with families and home obligations have found it necessary to incur indebtedness. Their financial inability to meet ordinary expenses and obligations is a matter of much concern to them, and to a certain extent must affect their efficiency. An officer who is adequately paid and whose mind is entirely free from financial worry will render better service to the Government than one who through sheer necessity has been obliged to become a debtor in order to meet his personal obligations and properly care for his family and dependents, whose welfare under these circumstances will be a cause of mental distress. Such worry might be the cause of unfitting an officer for the full performance of his duty at a critical time in the service and result in consequent disaster and loss of life.

5. The necessity of increasing the pay of Army officers is enhanced in the case of officers who have lately been called into the service from civil life. These business and professional men have generally received larger salaries or incomes than they now receive from the Government, for the reason that their qualifications enabled them to earn it. They have to a large extent sacrificed their business or professional interests and are giving the Government the full benefit of their experience and business or professional knowledge and services. It was necessary for these officers, upon entering the service, to expend from their own funds approximately $500 for the prescribed equipment and uniforms, which articles must be replenished from time to time as the need arises.

6. The question of adequate compensation for the Army officer upon whom the Nation relies to train, supervise, and direct the enlisted men under their command should receive careful study and consideration in view of the changed conditions during the past 10 years. If the scale of salaries fixed at that time were equitable, they must be considered as inequitable and inadequate at the present time.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] will preside until the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] arrives.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, with Mr. GARD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to delay consideration of this most important measure, for I have listened with deep interest to the enlightening discussion of the bill by members of the Ways and Means Committee and I have no doubt but what Members on both sides of the House will heartily support it.

We assume a grave responsibility in enacting this law, and we impose a heavy burden upon the people of the Nation by its terms.

Our people, however, are ready to assume the responsibility, and, I believe, are equal to the burdens which are placed on them by the various schedules of this bill. There is no disposition on the part of America to hesitate or to let up in the prosecution of the task we have set our minds upon until victory complete and emphatic is won.

But, Mr. Chairman, responsibility must also be assumed and shared by those who expend the moneys to provide which these heavy taxes are levied on the people. Officials, regardless of political affiliations, whose duty it is to expend these stupendous appropriations which we have been voting have a responsibility as solemn as we who vote the money and as grave as those who pay the bills. The taxpayers' money ought not and must not be extravagantly or wastefully expended.

I desire to direct the attention of the committee to what may be termed a practice, or perhaps a habit, or possibly more properly a disease, which seems to have become prevalent during the past 12 or 15 months, especially among the newly established boards, branches, bureaus, commissions, committees, departments, divisions, groups, sections, and other component parts of our governmental machinery, more particularly outside of the military. This epidemic has been an expensive one and has resulted in an increase of from four to five millions of dollars in expenditures; and the end, apparently, is not yet.

I refer to the greatly increased expenditures in the printing cost of the Government. This increase will, I believe, be more than five millions of dollars this year than it was before our entrance into the war, and may be more than ten millions, and the increase is not solely because of increased printing needs of the War and Navy Departments. The taxpayers, to my mind, have not received any benefit commensurate with this increase in cost. One of the chief results of this enormous expenditure has been to stimulate and make more regular the use of the wastebasket in places where it had hitherto been permitted to repose undisturbed. I doubt if many of the various governmental departments have curtailed their output of bulletins or publications to any appreciable degree. On the other hand, many other departments have increased their issuance, and each new bureau or agency seems to be created with an unappeasable appetite for pitiless publicity, which can only be partially satisfied by a corps of experts, editors, special writers, artists, and other impedimenta. In fact, to paraphrase a song, once popular, "Every little bureau has a bulletin of its own."

One would naturally expect, and I submit the people have a right to demand, the practice of economy in expenditures not intimately associated with our war activities during these serious times, but indications of this are sadly lacking. Possibly here and there a document or bulletin may have been dispensed with or discontinued, but new ones have been issued, either by that department or by another, until the list has become most formidable, and probably it will be claimed the combined issues of Government publications is doing most effective work in pushing the enemy back to and beyond the Hindenburg line.

The War Trade or War Industries Board has ordered the daily and weekly newspapers to curtail in the use of print paper and to comply with other restrictions. This edict will be obeyed by the press. Yet, while calling for conservation and economy by stern decree on the part of the newspapers of the country, the Federal Government has been and is practicing most wasteful methods in the use and consumption of print paper by its various activities and agencies. The United States, through its officials and departments, should set an example of economy and conservation; but, alas, on the contrary we have a deluge of bulletins, reports, surveys, magazines, summaries, and various other publications which are choking the Government Printing Office, clog the mails, and which clutter up many an office or counting-room in business houses and numerous parlors or sitting rooms in quiet, happy homes, and this at a time when we are urged on every side to practice thrift and save, buy war-saving stamps, and economize. Why, Mr. Chairman, if some of these phychological editors or editorial psychologists are paid at space rates, at the gait we are traveling the recent expenditures for airplanes we did not get will pale into insignificance.

It has been stated on good authority that it takes more than 1 pound of coal to supply power sufficient to produce 1 pound of paper, but a much less quantity of brains is sufficient to waste tons of the same print paper after it has been produced. [Applause.]

We ought, Mr. Chairman, in this war time to be printing fewer documents and less postage-free, tax-exempt publications, bulletins, letters, magazines, reports, and various and sundry papers.

We have traveled far, and at a pace fast and furious, since that fateful May morning when the Official Bulletin burst flaming forth across a war-beclouded sky with its announcement that it was designed to "inform the public on the progress of the war and of official acts incident thereto."

One was inclined, at that time, to wonder if the presses of the daily and weekly newspapers had suddenly been scrapped or if journalism had been declared treasonable. This publication was at the outset apparently handicapped by a tendency on the part of one of its ingredients to consider the world as his oyster and to confuse what actually occurred at sea and elsewhere with what was happening in the kaleidoscopic brain of him who penned those epics which need not now be repeated. It is only fair to say, however, that this publication has been toned down somewhat and no doubt is considered of interest and value by a large circle of its readers as it sets forth, on the whole, information in concise and authentic manner; some of it, however, 24 hours after it appears in the daily press. The Official Bulletin on August 17 last came to be known as the Official United States Bulletin, no doubt to distinguish it from some of the 57 other varieties.

The Joint Committee on Printing last winter recommended certain economies in the use of print paper, and effected a saving of nearly a million dollars, but in spite of this the mushroom growth of new journals has wiped out the saving and run rampant throughout many of the administrative departments.

I would cite a few instances where either joy of position or scatter-brain administration has cost Uncle Sam needless dollars, and which I submit we ought to save in the future. Taxing children's toys and candy as well as women's hats and stockings in order to maintain some of these documents is indefensible. Here is an instance, furnished me on apparently reliable authority, where the Alien Property Custodian desiring to dispose of the property of George Benda, of Boontown, N. J., a manufacturer of some sort of powders, sent out a 12-page pamphlet announcing the proposed sale of the Benda property under the trading-with-the-enemy act. Ordinary paper would not suffice for this announcement apparently, for it was printed on fine-coated paper 8¾ by 11 inches, estimated to cost 10 or 12 cents per pound, and sent through the mails in an envelope of heavy manila paper, size 12 by 15 inches. This envelope is an inch wider and an inch longer than the Saturday Evening Post. Not content with the expensive paper, but probably desiring to spoil as little as possible of the expensive pages used in the prospectus, care was taken to have borders on each page almost as wide as the space taken by the printed matter.

Conservation and economy apparently were unintentionally banned by the enemy-trade act.

Here is the Federal Board for Vocational Education issuing the Vocational Summary, printed on good white paper, family size, printing in full a copy of the vocational rehabilitation act with various articles clipped from other publications. Their first document was a statement of policies, a 70-page booklet, setting forth what they plan to do. Then came their annual report, a 30-page booklet of a little cheaper grade of paper, telling what they have thus far done, and these must, of course, be supplemented by the summary, a monthly publication merging what has been, is to be, and never can be done. And so it goes. The Shipping Board has broken out with printer's ink colitis in several places. We see the Merchant Mariner, published at Boston, which no doubt has its counterpart in Philadelphia, Hog Island, and probably other communities where ships are built. This is printed on a good grade of paper, illustrated, and printing information and news that of course could not be printed in a newspaper. Headlines inform a benighted public that "A New York policeman training for a sailor likes it too." "Dungarees just now mean more than police uniform." An illustration accompanies this inspiring article. A two-thirds page illustration, showing recruiting service enrolling agents with Mr. Louis Liggett in center background, with an announcement that the service has 6,854 official enrollment stations at Rexall Drug Stores in charge of an agent who receives $1 per year. No doubt to landlubbers who enroll sea sickness cures are offered at usual retail rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; briefly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I wanted to say to the gentleman in that connection that the Shipping Board itself has a publication which it claims is not official, although it sends it in an official wrapper.

Mr. WALSH. It is the Emergency Fleet News.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They claim it is not governmental. However, it is sent franked. They say the price of it to subscribers is $5, and they say that the price is made that high in order to make it practically prohibitive to subscribers. After they had printed four or five numbers they told me they had one paid subscriber and several thousand free subscribers. I asked, "What are you going to do with that $5? Where does it go?" They replied, "We presume it belongs in the Federal Treasury, in miscellaneous receipts, but we do not know how we will get it there." The paper was presumed to reach the thousands upon thousands of workmen in shipyards. But at that time they were putting out only about 20,000, which would not reach very far, and many columns of the fourth issue were devoted to a report of a banquet, where various chiefs flattered each other.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for the interesting information, of which I had some knowledge.

We are told in a column editorial that there is only one American merchant marine. This announcement is probably the principal reason for the publication of this chronicle, as the daily press has undoubtedly been insisting there were two American merchant marines, one in Boston and the other in Idaho. There is that illustrated daily Emergency Fleet News, filled with sea breezes and epigrams of the deep.

We received also a letter from the United States Shipping Board, inclosing an article reprinted from the Saturday Evening Post, issue of August 10, 1918, by permission of Curtis Publishing Co., and a release for September 21, entitled "Ocean delivery service for the farmer." These are both good reading, but in spite of the fact that they have been sent to thousands of chambers of commerce and similar bodies, if there was news of merit in them it ought not be necessary to reprint and circulate at Government expense an article from a magazine having over 2,000,000 subscribers. The Shipping Board has, it seems, a health and sanitation section of the industrial relations group through the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation. The manager of the information bureau tells us in an eight-page release, No. 527, that as an "impediment to the machinery of war the mosquito has proved to be quite as sinister a factor as the German propagandist or the jelly-fish pacifist." This heart throb will undoubtedly be reprinted free in the Saturday Evening Post. Watch for it in the front page of the metropolitan papers on September 29. If you can not abide your soul in patience until that date, read on September 22 a six-page release, No. 531, entitled "Everybody's doing it." What? Why, driving ship rivets, by the same Boswell, setting forth the experiences of men with intellectual faces, business-like faces, and men wearing overalls. This from the education and training section of the industrial relations group.

The Department of Agriculture issues several bulletins, news letters, crop reports, and food surveys weekly, and supplements these by loose sheets containing much of the same information in tables. I do not include Farmers' Bulletins, as the people know these and value them.

The latest number of this Merchant Mariner, published, probably, at the Hub of the Universe, shows on page 3 one of the L. K. Liggett drug stores at New Orleans, with a display in its windows, and headed "A live enrollment office window at New Orleans gets men in service." Possibly this free advertising for the various Liggett drug stores may have something to do with the generosity of these enrolling agents who have joined the vast army of a-dollar-a-year Government employees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Can the gentleman give any reason for the continuation of the governmental free Alaska Railroad Record, when the Government railroad itself and the building operations have greatly shriveled, with two of the commissioners out of it, and the railroad building plan going to pieces?

Mr. WALSH. In reply to the gentleman I will say I did not know that reason was an essential ingredient in connection with the greater portion of these publications.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Alaska railroad newspaper is made up in considerable part of personals, like—

Tom Brown, formerly employed on the railroad, has gone to the States.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that may be of great interest in Massachusetts and in Key West and produce much gloom in Berlin.

The Fuel Administration has published Fuel Facts, a booklet, on coated paper, with information much of which has appeared heretofore in the daily press as news. The Federal Reserve Bank has its Bulletin, likewise the regional banks, the Farm Loan Board. Then, School Life, from the Bureau of Education, is a dainty little publication, which will no doubt have riddles and charades in its columns in the near future.

The Surgeon General prints a magazine, Carry On. Of the lot this is evidently worth printing, and it shows care and forethought in its makeup.

Our old friend, The Reclamation Record, is still coming out. The September issue contains extracts from several Members of the Senate and House, three or four pages of reprints from editorial articles, a list of farm names, which will be a great relief to the sturdy wheat grower of Minnesota. He can now christen his farm by smashing a bottle of buttermilk against the silo, after the ship-launching style, and dub his farm anything from "Island Home" to "Mountain Glen." [Laughter.]

"Public Roads" is the title of a magazine issued by the Department of Agriculture containing some impressive illustrations and interesting information, but it might well be discontinued until after the war closes.

The list is too long to enumerate specifically, but it is of such proportions that it ought to be speedily and effectively shortened. The taxpayers of the Republic ought not to be levied upon in war time to pay for paper, ink, brains, or services of would-be Horace Greeleys and Jack Londons to splatter ideas about items which, if real news or of public interest, can be and ought to be and, in fact usually are, published in the daily press.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. In a little investigation which I made the other day I was told that the work of the Printing Office this year would amount to about $12,000,000, and that it had become the practice of the different departments of the Government not to confine their printing to the Government Printing Office, but to go outside and have work done by private printers under contract. Can the gentleman tell us how much of the Government work is done by outside private printers?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman that I have not been able to ascertain, although I have made inquiry of a Member of the Joint Committee on Printing touching an investigation being undertaken by a Member of another body—and I think the statistics with reference to this situation may be made public in a few days.

The newspapers of America are patriotic, and they ought not to be, by Federal decree, made the victims of demands on the ground of economy and conservation while wastefulness and extravagance are given free hand in governmental boards and departments.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. In a moment. I have here a small collection of some magazines, bulletins, releases, summaries, news, documents, letters, and so forth, that have been published by the various boards and commissions and departments, and if any Member had started in in April to save one copy each of the news bulletins and papers that have been issued, this table here, I fear, would not be strong or large enough to bear the weight of them.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I have listened with more than common interest to the gentleman's speech. I would like to ask him how he would reconcile the wastefulness on the part of these various departments in printing these documents at Government expense, the value of many of which is made known in the waste baskets all over the country and in the office building [laughter]—how he would reconcile that wastefulness with the oppressive and arrogant orders that have been issued to the country newspapers that they will not be allowed to send their newspapers to subscribers under a contract, and that the subscriptions must be paid within three months?

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman ask me to reconcile that?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. It can not be done. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. To your most rational conclusion and reply, I say amen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this war is not a political issue. It can not be made a political issue. Every effort that has been made, or that shall be made to that end, will recoil upon the heads of those who have fathered it.

A few days ago 13,000,000 men were enrolled as a reserve force to support the million and a half now in France and the million and a half that are now in the training camps of this country. When a great people are engaged in a mighty struggle like this, so small is the attempt, when the country is unified, to make a political asset out of that struggle for any party, that the judgment and conscience of the American people resent it. [Applause.]

This bill undertakes to raise $8,000,000,000. We have voted gladly, heartily, for power; man power, money power, law power, all power that is necessary to the efficient conduct of this war. Sometimes it is said that the folks at home are making the same sacrifice that the boys are making at the front. This can not be allowed, for we at home give of what we have, while the boys in France give of what they are and what they hope to be. That is the difference in kind. But the difference in degree is greater. We give a part of what we have, but the boys on the other side are laying upon the altar of their country all that they are and all that they hope to be. And so while the work of the men at home and the women at home and the children at home is essential, the difference is both in degree and in kind so overwhelming that it is well for us to remember that thus far not any of us here has touched the hem of the garment of real sacrifice. We have not suffered, many of us, not even inconvenience. We have spent freely and continue to spend our money. So while we are passing this $8,000,000,000 revenue bill I am not inclined to commiserate any man who has to pay for this cost. [Applause.]

We have had it heralded in literature and upon the rostrum that a republic can not wage war effectively, and there were those of us, perhaps, who thought before the outbreak of this war that that was true. It could not be done by a republic that was one in name only, by a republic in which the citizenship were not self-respecting, independent, educated people. For the first time in the history of the world, after 140 years of the most marvelous development that any country has ever known, the Republic of the United States has demonstrated to the world that a republic can be as efficient, if need be, as an autocracy. [Applause.]

It was common to hear men say before the beginning of this war that Germany was the most efficient country on the face of the earth, and many of us allowed it. But when an analysis is made, gentlemen, and we reflect that Germany has an area of 208,000 square miles, with a population of approximately 70,000,000, and that the United States has a territory of three and a half million square miles, over which was to be exercised its effective forces, we are constrained to believe that with any other people no such results would have been obtained in this country as have been obtained.

Let me compare Texas, which has an area of approximately 270,000 square miles, with the German Empire of 208,000 square miles. Crowd the population of the United States into Texas; put all of its railroads into Texas; begin on the Atlantic seaboard and name the cities—Boston and New York and Philadelphia, and all along the line—and crowd them into the State of Texas; and then go into the Middle West and pick up the twin cities of the Northwest, and Chicago, and St. Louis, and all the towns and all the coast cities, and crowd them into the State of Texas; and then pick up every railroad that has been built in this country and crowd it into the State of Texas; and take your trolley lines, take your canals, including the Isthmian Canal, and put them all into the State of Texas; and then attempt to crowd your 110,000,000 people into that State, and you will find that the people could not get in. They would have to walk around it simply to view the results that have been attained. [Applause.]

We have gotten into the habit of underestimating our physical achievements. And there were times, gentlemen, in which some men, at least, were inclined to underestimate the educational, the religious, and the social development of this country. But, under God, the American Republic has been most efficient in its production of men. [Applause.] And even if it were true that in mechanical efficiency, that in social organization, and many another line of development that has to do with physical things we had been surpassed, yet I trust the time may never come when our citizenship shall be made mechanically (applause), but that evermore we shall hold that he is most worthy and most efficient who has had an opportunity to take the initiative, to take it in professional life, to take it in business life, to take it in educational life, and along all the lines in which there is human activity.

We have demonstrated that a republic can wage war effectively. We have given all of the material means that are necessary, we have given all of the men that can be trained. But beyond that, conscious that, whenever abused, the powers might be taken back into the hands of the representatives of the people, we have conferred upon the President of the United States all the power that was necessary for him to effectively conduct the war. Both sides have joined in conferring that power, sometimes, perhaps, thinking that modification would have been better, but willing always to make the grant rather than to take the chance of tying his hands. And so the country has been united, and to-day it stands behind the President in the prosecution of this war as one solid mass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, may I have a few minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I know there are those, possibly, who even now will talk for peace without victory. But they are so few that they only emphasize the solidarity of the people.

Some things have been said about politics. Certain kinds of politics ought to be forever adjourned in this country—the politics of the gutter and the sewer, the politics of misrepresentation and insinuation. But politics in the highest sense is the philosophy of human government. There is no law upon the statute books, there is no constitution of any State, but that was wrought out in the arena of political debate; and if the time shall ever come when a self-respecting republic does not dare to discuss basic principles of government, then decadence will have set in.

In my own case I have honestly tried not to be partisan. The other day when this question was brought up as to whether a man having bought a liberty bond should be permitted to sell it again, honestly and earnestly using my judgment, as I have understood the principles of economy, I voted upon that amendment. I was sorry, indeed, that the honored leader of the other side of the House suggested that it was partisanship that urged men to vote as they did.

Just a word about partisanship and how early it entered this compaign. The honored Speaker of this House was called on the 14th of May to address a Democratic meeting in my own district, which was advertised to be the opening of the congressional campaign. That was six months before the election. Ah, men, it was perfectly right for him to go there. It was perfectly right for him to enter that campaign at that time; but, oh, the pharisaism, the hypocrisy of saying, "No politics," when politics was being worked every minute of the day. [Applause.]

The leaders of the Republican Party and its rank and file have studied only to know their duty. For the Republican Party was born of loyalty and has never been willing to sell out its birthright for a mess of pottage. They saw their duty clearly in this crisis. When that duty was known, they did it without question and with abounding enthusiasm. They have stood loyally behind every measure for the prosecution of the war. While the Democratic leaders of the House were arguing, hesitating, and in some cases opposing the measures of the President, he could rely upon the unswerving support of the Republican leadership of the House and a larger per cent of the rank and file than of the Democratic side. It seemed incongruous for Republicans to be called upon to urge support of the President's measures upon Democrats. But this attitude of Republicans is not hard to understand. Our conception is that this is one country, one flag, one Constitution, and whoever may be President, called to that high office by the votes of the American people, is then President of all the people.

It was no time for partisan politics; it is no time for merely partisan politics. The Democratic leaders of my district are anxious, and being anxious are willing to cry out patriotism while they are working politics. I know that this is not the sentiment of the people of my district. The crisis is too great, the sacrifices too far-reaching. Every city and hamlet and farm side has been reached. The home folks have their hearts and minds on the boys over there or on those who are going. It is extremely unfortunate that at such a crisis men are not able to rise to the full stature of American citizenship and not only say what they mean but mean what they say on this subject.

When I remember that the honored Speaker of the House, a Democrat; the leader of the House, a Democrat; the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, a Democrat, could not see the necessity that was upon us, I am surprised that anyone should oppose the reelection of the Republicans who stood solidly for all war measures. Those Democratic leaders were not disloyal, just mistaken, and yet in this crisis every man should have seen clearly and unmistakably his whole duty.

Not only upon the floor of the House but in the cloakrooms, where men voice their honest thoughts, the Republican membership wholeheartedly and with all their power rendered every support requested by the administration.

Even where there may have been room for doubt as to the necessity of the powers granted the Republicans recognized that the responsibility rested upon the President and thought it disloyal to tie his hands in any way in the efficient conduct of the war. There is something about Republican principles that gives a man power to see. I had no doubt as to the power of the National Government to defend itself against foes from without or from within. In the crucible of civil war we had determined that the Constitution of the United States operates upon the individual and not upon the States and as if there were no States. On that proposition Oliver P. Morton was elected governor of the State of Indiana in 1862. With that as the anchor to our institutions Abraham Lincoln triumphed in 1865. Every law that we pass for the efficient conduct of the war was drawn in conformity with the Republican principles. The war is not an issue, the war is a job. It is our job, it is the job of Republicans and Democrats alike, of the whole people. We shall win. It may take two years, it may take four, but whatever of time and whatever of sacrifice it may take, devote the time and make the sacrifice.

To that end the unity of our people must be maintained. Every American citizen should be treated as loyal until by word or deed he proves himself otherwise. No man can be moderately patriotic. "All that we have, all that we are, all that we hope to be," we should be willing to lay on the altar of our country. That is not only good Americanism but it is good republicanism as well. "With malice toward none and with charity for all" we should fight this war in defense of our most sacred rights and the maintenance of our national honor. If we are wise, if we are honest, if we are fair to our neighbor and just to all concerned, out of it will come a new citizenship, reconstructed, transformed, glorified, and unified.

In the reconstruction that is to follow there are great problems, both social and economic as well as governmental, that will demand not only the best thought of the brightest men of this country but their honest thought as well. The Republican Party has always been constructive. It preserved the structure of the Union. It conserved the economic system of this country. It saved us from the free-silver heresy.

It gave us a sound banking system. It is a friend of labor. It is not sectional in its thought. It does not discriminate in legislation, but legislates for the whole country and not for a part of it. You can trust the Republican Party and you will. It has never deceived you, frank and open and above board in its convictions, it sees the needs of the country and is prepared to legislate along safe and sane lines. There is so much said that is untrustworthy, so much that is born of desire rather than of knowledge, that our people sometimes wonder what the situation is. I think it unwise at all times to publish broadcast all the information that the Government may have, either in military or diplomatic circles, but when information is given it should be reliable, the view should not be too rosy.

May the time soon come when every statement that emanates from any department of the Government can be relied upon implicitly. "Flattery spits her poison at the mightiest peers;" adulation may adle the brain. Unstinted glorification sometimes is as dangerous as it is foolish and immoral. The problems before the President are tremendous, his responsibilities grave. At this time the wisdom and conscience of the Nation should be freely utilized by him in the prosecution of the war. The Republican Party has helped and not hindered; it will continue to help and not hinder. Its help has been indispensable. That help is indispensable now. We are going to offer it and insist on its being used until the war is over.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. REAVIS addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I indeed enjoyed the splendid speech of our colleague [Mr. REAVIS] who has been across the water, and it strikes me that in view of his statements to this House it must now be impressed upon the mind of every man, regardless of what party he belongs to or what section of country he comes from, that this great revenue bill of $8,182,000,000 that is now before us for consideration should be unanimously passed, and that instead of it being a burden to anyone—as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who stated in a speech day before yesterday that it is not a tax but a burden—in my judgment the revenues collected from the industries, from the corporations, from individuals, from business activities and all persons is an obligation or duty that should be cheerfully met by every concern and every individual in this great Republic. [Applause.]

When we think of these boys who have gone across the deep blue sea, undergoing the sufferings, the hardships, and the privations that we know each and all are undergoing to-day; when we consider that since the 6th day of June, 1917, when the first American battalion marched through the city of Paris, our troops have been safely convoyed from our shores to Europe, and that on this day 1,000,000 American bayonets and big howitzers, big machine guns, light artillery, and heavy artillery are attacking the city of Metz and are on German soil, having driven the enemy clear back from the Marne over onto German soil, and that perhaps before the sun goes down this evening those big howitzers will be belching forth lead and fire into every house and business place in the fortified city of Metz; with these wonderful achievements of our country performed in such a short time, with our soldiers displaying such courage, bravery, and heroism, surely every man in this Congress should be proud of the fact that he can vote to reach out the long arm of taxation to support and maintain these chivalrous soldiers and sailors who are fighting not only for the life of this country but for civilization itself. [Applause.]

With the American soldier offering his life on the battlefield, surely no business, no corporation, no patriotic individual in the broad domain of the United States of America or any of our possessions would object to the last farthing of his income above a living being taken to maintain and support our soldiers and sailors engaged in this great conflict. I was not only shocked—and I shall not say an unkind word—but I was absolutely amazed by some of the gentlemen who criticized this bill and talked about taxes that could be raised in other ways. This is no time for criticism. My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said that one-third of the money raised under the law comes from three States of this Union. He ought to be proud of the honor of living in a State that contributes so much to the support of this Government and the support of our soldiers and sailors in this great struggle. Instead of Pennsylvania and Illinois and New York objecting to their contribution, they should be proud of the great place they hold on the roll of honor as being such large contributors to the support of this Nation in this great war. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. One minute, please. I hope you refer only to Mr. MOORE. There are two splendid gentlemen here just from Pennsylvania, and I am from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DONOVAN. I am from New York also. I believe you referred to Mr. LONDON. He represents only one part of New York.

Mr. QUIN. Indeed, I am proud that you gentlemen do not hold to the spirit of my Republican friend, Mr. MOORE, and our Socialist friend, Mr. LONDON.

Mr. FOCHT. Thank you——

Mr. QUIN. He [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania] went so far as to say we ought to endeavor to raise taxes by going to some poor cotton farmer and put a tax on his bale of cotton! In the face of so many billions of dollars coming from the fields of incomes and productive corporations in the last few months throughout the country, the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE] feels aggrieved that $8,182,000,000 should be levied by taxation upon the incomes and excess profits of the rich. Why, that does not cover even the top crust of the great wealth of his State and the other great States to the north and south and east and west, and for that matter all of the States and the Territories of this great Republic, which can be devoted to the support of our Nation in this awful crisis.

Surely the people of the United States from one end of this Republic to the other feel proud of the flag and feel proud of the glorious achievements of our armed forces to-day. And while we are sitting here, the American soldiers, assisted by the French, have captured St. Mihiel and 13,700 prisoners within the last 24 hours, and taken 90 guns and 70 villages, and have driven the German forces beyond the border lines at one point and driven them back onto German soil; and instead of there being any criticism in this hour, there should be great rejoicing in this Chamber, as well as in every hamlet and village and field and factory throughout the whole United States of America. It is a time to rejoice and a time to be proud. Instead of our friends criticizing some little printing department of this Government, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] did to-day, we ought to be lifting our voices in praise to God that the United States of America stands with such solidarity behind the President of this Nation, that the people of this country stand behind those who thus uphold the arm of our Commander in Chief in supporting the boys who have gone across the sea and those in the training camps of this country, ready to lay down their lives at any moment on the altar of their country. [Applause.]

The American people have their eyes on this body, and instead of criticisms being made here against the different officials and the Cabinet officers of this Republic, and against the ways in which we are raising this revenue by the fairest and most equitable method of taxation possible, and one that hinders, hurts, or injures no industry and no individual and no corporation throughout this whole Republic; instead of there being condemnation and criticism of it there should be nothing but praise, in order that every taxpayer should realize fully that we feel in our hearts that he is justly taxed, and that he could do even more without any harm or injury to anyone. In passing this measure so that this Government may raise by taxation the money necessary to maintain the Government and to prosecute the war, we have before us a task that as legislators we must cheerfully meet. If we do so, the people on whom this tax is levied, realizing the spirit of fairness and nonpartisanship that has been displayed by the committee in bringing out this bill, will realize from one end of the country to the other that it is a just war and a just taxation, and they will feel that it is a pleasure and an honor to be taxed in order to support and maintain the Government and prosecute the war. From one end of the country to the other comes the cry, "Stand by the boys in the trenches; stand by the sailors on the seas"; and in order to do that every man, regardless of his sentiments or his politics, must stand by the Commander in Chief, the great President of this Republic, who issues the orders for all the soldiers and the sailors who are to-day fighting to protect the honor of this Nation and preserve the civilization of this earth. With this glorious cause before us, with our soldiers inspired by this noble spirit and the high ideal for which they know they are fighting, every citizen of this Republic must rejoice in the fact that the American Congress stands as a unit in supporting this great measure, in supporting this bill that raises the money to maintain the noble heroes who are offering their lives in order that the Nation's life may be continued. Because if our Nation were not able to send its armies in full force across the seas to-day, not only would the lives of our allies be cut off by the cruel and brutal Germans but the life of our own Nation would be at stake; and as stated by the leader of our party, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], we are fighting for our Nation's life, and in this great struggle every man, whether he has an income of $20,000,000 a year or whether he has a little income of $1,000 or $500 a year, should feel proud of the fact that he is able to contribute something to this Government to support and help maintain these boys who are on the high seas and who are across the seas in the trenches fighting day and night that our Nation may continue to live. [Applause.]

With this great Republic, holding in its arms the civilization of the world and engaged in the purification of the dark places and in cleansing the polluted air, it should be a privilege and a pleasure and an honor for every man on this floor to support this splendid bill that raises this vast amount of money in such a fair, equitable, and just manner. No man, regardless of where he may come from, can point to any portion of this splendid bill and say that it works a hardship upon any man. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who believes that all taxation should come through a tariff, has suggested that we should reach out and tax tea and coffee. Who wants to do that? While this great Nation has an income of $45,000,000,000 a year, who wants to reach out and tax unnecessarily the coffee that the poor must drink and the tea that we must have? One gentleman said we ought to tax every sale of merchandise that is made in this country and put a 1 per cent tax on all kinds of articles that are sold. Another gentleman thinks you ought to tax every bale of cotton that is sold. All of that kind of partisan nonsense should be waved aside as chaff that is blown away in a cyclone, and the great fundamental principle must be recognized that in raising this large sum of money we must reach out and tax those who are best able to bear it, without imposing an undue burden upon anyone. That is a principle that ought to appeal to the sense and the honor and the intelligence of every citizen of this great Republic. [Applause.] The people do not mind being taxed for this glorious purpose. The patriotic people of this Republic do not object to any of the laws that this Congress has passed to uphold the hands of the President of this Nation. The people of this Republic have not anywhere yet through their vote, when they have gone to elect a Congressman or a Senator, condemned a single law that the President of the United States has asked this Congress to pass and which is to-day on the statute books. The people of this Republic are well satisfied, and if the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania] would get it into his mind that politics has been adjourned and continue to help uphold the hands of the President of this Nation there would be less partisanship, there would be less ill feeling, and the people of this country would be more of a unit in solid support of the American Government and of the President of this Nation than they have ever yet been in the history of this great Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with particular pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] in his wonderful description of his recent visit to the battle fields of France and of the work which our boys are doing over there. I had concluded that when he finished, the last word had been spoken for the speedy passage of the bill. I thought it would ill become me to intrude myself upon the patience of the committee by any contribution to the debate, and resolved that I should not participate in it, but the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], who concluded his remarks just immediately preceding me, made a statement that reflected upon the honor of my State, and dissuaded me from my resolution, and decided me that it would be doing less than my duty if I did not take the floor and enter a disclaimer. The gentleman from Mississippi stated that both Pennsylvania and New York objected to contributing their share of the tax to be imposed under the provisions of this bill and, as a basis for his statement, gave the names of two individual Members of this body representing respective districts therefrom. One, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is of the minority party, and the other a member of what might be termed the subminority party, if there could be such a party designation. However, the gentleman from New York, who is mutually respected by both parties in this House, does not, I think, typify or epitomize the views of the State of New York, and certainly he does not in so far as I may have the opportunity to speak for it.

The great Empire State of New York, with its metropolitan city, the acknowledged financial center of the world, is the civic, social, and patriotic equal of any State in this or any other land. It has been from the time of its foundation to this present hour in the vanguard, valiantly fighting the battle of humanity, equality, and justice, and has always willingly and gladly contributed its share of man power and treasure. It is my opinion that the New York Representatives will unanimously support this measure when it is moved for final passage.

This bill proposes a departure in its scope and application from any previous revenue bill that has ever heretofore been enacted by this House, and has for its object the taxing of the wealth of the country. It abolishes the 8 per cent tax on all labor incomes in excess of $6,000 which applied under the law enacted in 1917, which imposed on an individual an income-tax rate on the basis that a man who worked for his income by personal labor should be compelled to pay a tax greater than the man whose investments were the chief source of his income. The omission of a so-called consumption tax disposes of a problem that in its very nature presents vexatious angles and the deference of which I think is but temporary. I am led to this conclusion by the fact that the ban on brewing promulgated by Executive order since this bill was submitted to the House for consideration and by which an estimated deficit of $1,066,000,000 is created can be only supplied by the levying of a consumption or tariff tax.

The consolidation of the rates of preceding acts and of its own in the present bill makes a clarity of terms and of context which will be received with unanimous accord, for it is undeniable that in the estimating and compiling of the tax payable under the provisions of the earlier acts were most intricate. The cartoonists throughout the country took delight in making game of poor Mr. Citizen in his earnest endeavor to do his bit in arriving at a conclusion of what was the correct amount for him to pay.

The major portion of the revenues estimated to be raised under the various schedules set up in the bill discloses that beverages containing alcohol are to pay $1,066,000,000; tax on corporations, $900,000,000; income tax from individuals, $1,500,000,000; war and excess profits tax, $3,200,000,000; and the balance to be raised from other commodities classed as luxuries and the like. It is contemplated that of the $24,000,000,000 necessary to be raised for the year's governmental expenditures the bulk of this immense sum will be raised by the sale of bonds, two-thirds of which will be so raised, the remaining one-third, $8,000,000,000, to be raised by taxation under this bill by the bond and taxation method by which a division of the payment will be made between the present and future generations, which is both just and equitable.

The enacting into law of this bill places a solemn responsibility upon this body, for by it the people of this country will be called upon to assume and contribute in a larger degree than they have ever heretofore, to the maintenance of the Government, but they readily realize the necessity for the vast expenditures which are every day being made in the prosecution of the war, as well as in the administration of the General Government.

It is estimated that an expenditure between five and six billion dollars is needed each year to carry on the expenses of the war. The American people, realizing the necessity for the need of this vast sum, will not only cheerfully accept their responsibility under the provisions of the bill but will inaugurate a curtailment of their expenditures and pleasures and willingly return to the practice of thrift such as the founders of this Republic proclaimed and practiced. Gladly will they make the additional sacrifice for a righteous cause and for the success of our overseas forces. Yet the most we can do by the payment of a tax or the purchase of bonds is minute and shallow in comparison to the work and the sacrifice of life made for us by the intrepid men who are fighting for our very existence.

The necessity for the passage of this bill is too apparent for me to further discuss or urge. The Committee on Ways and Means, composed as it is of a partisan membership and many of whom are master minds and whose thoughts and opinions and technical knowledge on the subjects contained in the schedules in this bill far outweigh any advantage that education, observation, or experience has afforded me, has unanimously reported this measure with a recommendation for its passage, and by so doing has brushed aside all partisanship and demonstrated its statesmanship and genuine, patriotic, loyal Americanism.

I shall vote for the bill as reported, for the reasons which I have already advanced and for the further reason that being one of a group of the membership of the House that was elected subsequent to the beginning of the war, in my pre-election statement, made to the people of my district, I promised if elected I would stand unreservedly for the policies of the Commander in Chief, Woodrow Wilson, in his efforts for a speedy and successful termination of the war. I have in accordance therewith kept faith with my people, and in keeping faith with them I am but keeping faith with their sons, their brothers, and their fathers who are now fighting, bleeding, and dying for you and me on the hell-swept battle fields of France to continue and perpetuate the principles of liberty, justice, and democracy until we shall have swept German autocracy and barbarism forever from the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York, being one of those apparently criticized by the gentleman from Mississippi, that I have no particular quarrel with the measure raising $8,000,000,000. I criticized certain features of the bill, but I intend to vote for it, so there is no lack of patriotism so far as that particular feature is concerned.

Mr. DONOVAN. The statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be admitted, marked in evidence as Exhibit 1, and it is consistent with all other acts of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, according to my observation since I have been a Member of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the German vice chancellor in his Stuttgart speech yesterday made a plea for peace without victory and without indemnities. He also urged that the peace be negotiated before the allied armies reach German soil. There can be no such peace. [Applause.] Peace must follow a victory that is so complete that no government or people will ever again contemplate the conquest of the world. [Applause.]

Nothing in the progress of human history has ever been of such moment to mankind as a complete military victory by the allied armies over the armies under the outlaw Government of Germany, and this victory should and shall be won on the German side of the Rhine. [Applause.] Prussian autocracy, the outlaw Government that now disgraces civilization, must be destroyed upon the soil that bears the shame of its birth and punishment imposed and indemnity required that is suited to all its crimes against humanity.

This work now presses forward and gives glorious promise of immediate accomplishment. Our military and naval forces are doing their part of the work; shells are reaching German soil; our soldiers are on their way to Berlin. [Applause.] When the military victory that is now in sight is complete, then the round table.

And it is not inopportune to say that the most important international matters that have ever been the subject of parley or engaged the attention of nations and international statesmen will be considered at the peace conference at the close of the war. The allies, as victors, will award the honors, assess the damages, and apportion the benefits of the most stupendous war in the history of civilization. Questions affecting for centuries the welfare of the nations involved and of all mankind will be considered and settled there.

It is in no sense disparaging to other nations to say that our own country will have large interests to conserve at that conference. In our case the welfare of 110,000,000 of people and of their posterity for centuries is involved. A great estate is affected. The work, therefore, of preparing for the peace table becomes important, whether the victory shall be this year, next year, or the year after. Who shall sit at that table for us? It will be no place for mediocrity or inexperience. The most accomplished international statesman to-day living in Europe and Asia will be seated there as the representatives of governments participating in the war. There can be no impropriety in now suggesting that the ablest and most experienced men in our Republic be asked by the President to hold themselves in readiness and to prepare themselves for that stupendous task. In this connection I would like to see our living ex-Presidents, the Chief Justice of our Supreme Court, our Secretary of State, our former living ambassadors who have served in European and Asiatic courts with rare distinction and great ability, and the chairmen and ranking members of the Committees on Foreign Affairs in both the House and Senate all members of that great commission. The commission should also include at least two members each, representing business, labor, and finance.

The men I have suggested would make the members of the American commission the equals in high order of ability and in international reputation of the members of any other nation participating in the settlement of the greatest questions that have engaged the minds of international statesmen in all the annals of time. The American people would feel a sense of security if such a commission as has been suggested was assured as the representatives of this great Republic in that great conference. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, all I want to say on the bill under consideration is that it is my purpose to support it, as I think it is the purpose of everyone in the House. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, the matter of which I shall speak for a moment will, I know, at this time be of but little interest to the Members of the House and the country because of the fact that we are all absorbed in this revenue measure and in the war work. But I wish to place in the RECORD some material which I have been gathering for some time that I think will in the very near future be of service to us all. As some of us know, there is coming up a very serious question in certain sections of the United States as to the increased use of drugs and of opiates. As to why this is true I am not going to say; and it would not make any difference if I did say it, because somebody on the other side with a long argument would get up and say that it was brought in here by certain interests.

Nevertheless it is a fact, and it is a fact that is now beginning to attract the attention of both sides of the House and the Senate. It is going to be of much deeper significance when the investigations are pushed forward than we now imagine.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that there was a considerable amount of data on that subject presented to our committee when we were considering the bill, but unfortunately—I do not know the reason—it was not preserved in the hearings. I merely mention it because it might be considered by the House that no data was before the committee when the provision in the bill on that subject was drafted.

Mr. MEEKER. I am glad the gentleman mentioned it; I was coming to it. I was going to say that enough data has been placed before the Ways and Means Committee to call for some special legislation along the lines of a suppression of the distribution of drugs and opiates.

This material that I shall place in the RECORD has been collected very carefully and will give to the House excerpts from the writings of some fifty of the best known physicians and medical authorities here and in Europe as to the medicinal use or value of alcohol. All I have to say upon this question I am now saying. Everything that goes into this extension of remarks are the writings, not the sayings, of these men. I simply submit them to the country and the Congress for the service which they will be. I am not going to say which side of this long drawn out discussion they will most benefit. Whatever I have done along the line of solving one of the most significant social and economic problems that America is trying to solve has been done from no selfish purpose, to satisfy no selfish ambition. These facts are submitted for what they are worth, and I trust that in the discussions that may follow both here and at the other end of the Capitol they will be used. If there is any merit or demerit or credit or discredit for having collected them, I am willing to accept that, but beyond there I shall let these men be brought in as witnesses and authorities in this discussion. We can not dodge this issue. Less than two year ago I said that a certain organization was receiving money from manufacturers of cocaine articles that are being sold over the counters of this country which are habit-forming drugs, and that organization is the only national organization which up to date is opposing this investigation.

The excerpts to which I have referred are as follows:

THE VALUE OF ALCOHOL: BEING ABSTRACTS FROM THE WRITINGS OF THE WORLD'S FOREMOST MEDICAL AUTHORITIES.

[Abraham Jacobi, M. D., L. L. D., M. A., Nestor of American Medicine. From the Medical Economist, July, 1918.]

There will be a time soon when our courts of "justice" will be crowded with fanatical, ignorant women and their grasping attorneys, and unchristian healers, in prosecution and persecution of your honest doctors, who know they have benefited their patients with small, or, as the case may be, big doses of alcohol.

The alcohol question is not one of tavern life, or the vagaries of drunkards, or the whims of fickle women. What we, the doctors, are principally interested in is the value of alcohol as a medicine and a food, and many of us consider it from the point of view of its sociological import. Both points of view are of equal value. As physicians we are fortunate enough to be better informed than people in general, but after all that increases our duties as citizens.

Physicians have always found alcohol a valuable, aye, an indispensable, remedy. There is hardly a human organism which is not favorably influenced; mainly the aged, feeble, fat, and convalescent feel its benefactions.

Alcohol treatment, that means wine in moderate doses of diluted liquors, is highly appreciated by physicians and those who are teachable, and recognized as an article of diet and cure. It need not make you strong, but it makes you feel strong; for temporary efficiency that is of import and efficient. It makes your waning pulse return, your fainting attack pass by, and your fatigued or exhausted muscle recover. The value of alcohol should not be estimated or supposed, but studied and demonstrated. A prohibition movement kept up by "400,000 women" is no proof. Nor are 600 Congressmen capable of deciding a scientific problem. Great scientists, fortified by the results of their experience extending over a century of studies in the laboratories or at the bedsides are required to furnish the proofs. They are numerous.

In diphtheria there is more danger in giving too little than too much. When the pulse begins to be small and frequent, alcohol must be given at once. In the septic form, especially, the intoxicating action of alcohol is not observed, the pulse becomes slower and stronger and the patient becomes restful. The dose can hardly be too large. Cases of young children in sepsis would improve immediately when 3 ounces of whisky was increased in one day to 12 ounces.

My life has been spent among the sick and the recovering and the dying. That has been so with diphtheria since 1858. Many thoroughly septic cases got well after having been "given up." No amount of whisky will ever lead to intoxication when its effect is wanted to combat sepsis. There are cases which recover without treatment, but we do not know beforehand which they will be. No alleged mild case is safe until recovery has taken place. When heart failure has once set in—and it frequently does in apparently mild cases—our efforts are too often in vain. Thus alcoholic stimulants ought to be given early and often, and in large quantities, thoroughly diluted. There is no such thing as danger from them or intoxication in septic diseases.

In the treatment of infant diarrhea and dysentery small and frequent doses of alcohol will certainly stimulate the nervous system, digestion, and circulation, and they also stimulate the skin and increase perspiration. Alcohol given in this manner certainly arrests fermentation. Moreover, it takes the place of food and will act favorably as food where no solid carbohydrates are tolerated by the intestinal tract. As it is absorbed in the stomach, so does it protect the intestinal tract. Alcohol preparations, always taking small doses for granted, are good stomachics; that is, they aid you in your digestion.

[William Osler, M. D., LL. D., regius professor of medicine, Oxford University. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, London. Honorary Professor of Medicine, Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, etc. The Principles and Practice of Medicine. 1906.]

In moderation, wine, beer, and spirits may be taken throughout a long life without impairing the general health.

I should be sorry to give up the use of alcohol in the severer forms of enteric fever and pneumonia.

In typhus fever the patients require from the outset a supporting treatment. Water should be freely given, and alcohol in suitable doses.

In cerebrospinal fever, whisky or brandy may be given freely when there are signs of a failing heart.

In diphtheria, with severe constitutional symptoms, stimulants should be given early.

In yellow fever, in the initial stage, ice should be given and brandy and hot coffee.

In tuberculosis the bitter tonics and the various malt preparations are often most satisfactory. The indications for alcohol are enfeebled digestion with fever or weak heart and rapid pulse. In the advanced stages whisky and milk may be given with great advantage. The red wines are also beneficial in moderate quantities. For the distressing night cough the spirits of chloroform given in whisky before going to bed is efficaceous.

In infantile diarrheas, where there is prostration, brandy or whisky in frequent doses, or where there is nausea, champagne with cracked ice is most helpful.

For sleeplessness, one of the most distressing features of valvular disease of the heart, a dose of the spirits of chloroform, or of ether in a little hot whisky, will sometimes give a good night's rest.

[William Edward Fitch, M. D., major, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S. A., formerly lecturer on surgery, Fordham University School of Medicine; assistant attending gynaecologist, Presbyterian Hospital Dispensary, New York; attending physician to the Vanderbilt Clinic, College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, etc., and forty contributors. Dietotherapy, published by permission of The Surgeon General of the United States, 1918.]

It is the opinion of careful students of the subject, that the moderate use of alcohol in health is harmless. It undoubtedly has a place in disease. It may be employed in fevers and wasting diseases, where by its oxidation, it limits the destruction of bodily tissues, reduces the temperature and stimulates the heart and circulation. Young children and aged persons bear stimulants well.

There are reasons for the theory that alcohol actually increases the resisting power of the body to the poisonous toxins of the septic fevers.

In some chronic diseases, such as diabetes, alcohol is used advantageously to replace a certain amount of carbohydrate in the diet.

The aromatic and bitter principles employed in beer are harmless when taken in moderation, and usually exert a tonic action on the stomach. They serve to stimulate the appetite, invigorate the system, and so act as agents introducing into the body an increased supply of nutriment.

It is probable that a tumblerful of good brisk beer may actually aid digestion, by increasing appetite and stimulating a more abundant secretion of the gastric juice, as well as stimulating more active movements of the stomach.

Stout and porter are popularly believed to be more digestible. Says Hutchison: "If it be desired to avoid nervousness and to get rid of insomnia, shun tea and coffee, and drink stout."

On account of the extractives present, beer contains more nourishment than any other alcoholic beverage.

It has been determined by exhaustive study of the effects of malt liquors on the digestive system, that, when containing the bitter principle of hops, they act as appetizers, aid digestion, and encourage sleep. These properties make them of value in certain forms of dyspepsia and debility, especially when induced by disease, overexertion, worry, neuralgia, and the like.

Genuine malt liquors can be produced of low alcoholic strength (2 per cent alcohol). These are practically nonintoxicating.

As a cardiac stimulant alcohol should be given when heart failure is impending. Disappearance of the first sound always calls for the administration of alcohol. In cardiac failure accompanying acute disease, unlimited quantities of brandy are indicated.

Alcohol is of great value for its stimulating effect upon the spirits in conditions of profound nervous exhaustion, where there is great depression. It also produces remarkable soothing effects in muscular weakness.

Alcohol taken moderately, immediately before or during meals, promotes the appetite and aids digestion, lessens the elimination of waste products, causes a subjective sensation of heat and slightly raises the body temperature.

As a result of much experimentation, it has been determined that from 1 to 1½ fluid ounces of absolute alcohol can be completely oxidized in the human system within a period of 24 hours, and in such a way that none of its narcotic effects are manifested, and no unchanged alcohol appears in the urine.

It is estimated that this amount of alcohol would be contained in the following amounts of the common alcoholic drinks:

	Fluid ounces.
Brandy or whisky, 50 per cent alcohol	2
Port, sherry, etc., 20 per cent alcohol	5
Claret, hock, champagne, 10 per cent alcohol	10
Bottled beer, 2¾ per cent alcohol	30

Wine has a restorative action on those exhausted by fatigue, mental labor, insufficient food or long illness, and in various diseases, such as anemia, atony of the digestive organs, and general debility.

Good champagne can be taken with impunity by gouty and rheumatic patients, and is very serviceable in cases of acute illness where there is a tendency to heart failure, in obstinate vomiting and convalescence. It is a valuable remedy in fevers and other wasting diseases.

[Julius Friedenwald, M. D., professor of gastro-enterology, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Baltimore, and John Ruhrah, M. D., professor of children's diseases, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Baltimore. Diet in Health and Disease, 1917.]

Alcohol has food value. It protects the protein of food and body tissue from consumption, as has been demonstrated by Atwater, and in this way it serves the body as a food.

The rapidity of its absorption and ease of oxidation makes it a valuable adjunct in feeding individuals in extreme wasted conditions.

The use of alcohol is of undoubted value in medicine. The use and abuse have been confounded.

It is frequently used as a stomachic to produce appetite and stimulate the secretion of the gastric juice.

It is also a respiratory stimulant and used in heart weakness.

Malt liquors in moderate quantities seem to aid digestion, increase appetite, and stimulate gastric digestion. They have considerable food value.

Wines in moderate quantities also improve digestion. Fortified wines in small quantities are the appropriate stimuli for certain kinds of infantile and youthful debility adn of the enfeebled nervous systems of old persons.

[Louis Fischer, M. D., pediatrist to Zion Hospital, Suydenham Hospital, New York, etc. Disease of Infancy and Childhood, 1914.]

Following the birth of the child, iced champagne will do more to allay irritation than all medication.

If the mother is accustomed to drinking wine or beer, it is unwise to discontinue the practice while nursing.

Many women whose flow of milk is scant will secrete an abundance of milk after partaking of a glass of beer or ale with their meals.

Beer has a decided laxative effect, and this is rather an advantage where there is a tendency to constipation.

To increase the total quantity of milk in the breasts of the nursing mother malt extracts may be helpful.

In acute gastric catarrh of infants malt extract should be given to aid nutrition.

In anemia malt preparations, wine, or champagne are often valuable.

In symptoms of collapse in broncho-pneumonia active alcoholic stimulation is indicated.

Malt extracts contain a live factor and are therefore valuable as an antiscorbutic restorative.

[Charles Gilmore Kerley, M. D., professor of Diseases of Children, New York Polyclinic School and Hospital; attending physician to the New York Nursery and Childs Hospital, etc. The Practice of Pediatrics, 1918.]

Alcohol is occasionally of great service in diseases of children. Under certain conditions it answers better than any other means of stimulation. Its use in my hands has been that of a food and a stimulant in very grave conditions.

It has been of much service in two conditions in which, in my opinion, nothing can replace it.

I refer, first, to that time which may arise in any grave disease when the heart fails to respond to the usual stimulation. Alcohol given well diluted is usually well borne and assimilated. It supports the heart, improves the respiration, and often will carry the patient through to a successful convalescence even when the outlook is very unpromising.

The second condition in which alcohol is useful is in cases with greatly lowered vitality resulting from some severe illness. If a child is suffering from shock, bordering on collapse, alcohol will do much to sustain him until he is able to assimilate easily digested food.

The use of alcohol in moderate amounts in the form of malt liquors or wine will usually increase the fat in the mother's milk. I have frequently seen it advance 2 per cent in from two to three days.

[Charles Hunter Dunn, M. D., instructor in pediatrics, Harvard University, physician in chief at the Infant's Hospital, etc. Pediatrics, the Hygienic and Medical Treatment of Children, 1917. Founded upon the teachings of Thomas Morgan Rotch, M. D.]

Alcohol is well tolerated by young children, even by infants. Its chief value in early life is as a tonic, particularly in conditions of malnutrition. It is useful in many chronic conditions and in acute febrile diseases late in the course of the disease.

[L. Emmett Holt, M. D., Sc. D., LL. D., professor of diseases of childhood in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York; attending physicians to the Babies' and Foundling Hospitals, etc.; and John Howland, A. M., M. D., professor of pediatrics in the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore; pediatrician in chief to the Johns Hopkins Hospital, etc. The Diseases of Infancy and Childhood, 1916.]

Alcoholic stimulants are well tolerated even by young children.

With many women the use of malted liquors, ale, beer, etc., increase the quantity of milk and the proportion of fat.

Unless taken in large amounts by the mother, alcohol does not appear in her milk, and there is no sufficient evidence that in usual amounts it has any deleterious effect upon the milk.

There is little doubt that alcohol is at times of much benefit.

[Arthur R. Cushny, M. D., LL. D., F. R. S., professor of pharmacology in the University of London; examiner in the Universities of London, Manchester, Oxford, Cambridge, Glasgow, Leeds, etc. A Textbook of Pharmacology and Therapeutics, 1918.]

Alcohol allays the anxiety and distress of the patient, promotes rest and sleep, and thus aids toward healing, or, at the worst, renders illness more tolerable.

Small quantities of other narcotics might be substituted for alcohol, but none of them perhaps excel it in producing that spirit of hopefulness and restful confidence which contributes so much to recovery.

In sudden chill with a tendency to fever, alcohol is often of great benefit, especially when taken in the form of brandy or whisky diluted with hot water.

In chronic conditions of cachexia and loss of flesh in general and during convalescence alcoholic preparations are often advised simply as foods, and in these cases the ales, beers, and porters are generally to be preferred to the others, as they contain other foodstuffs of value, in addition to the alcohol.

Alcohol is of value as a mild hypnotic, a comparatively small quantity taken before retiring being often sufficient to secure quiet and refreshing sleep. Beer or spirits and water is generally used for this purpose.

[George Frederick Still, M. A., M. D., F. R. C. P., physician for diseases of children, Kings' College Hospital; professor of diseases of children, Kings' College, London. Common Disorders and Diseases of Childhood, 1915.]

I think there are very few cases of broncho-pneumonia in infancy in which alcohol is not advantageous at some period of the disease; in older children also, when the heart action is becoming enfeebled and the child is becoming exhausted, alcohol is most valuable.

The value of alcohol in the early stage of severe diarrhea, when there is extreme exhaustion and collapse, is, I think, quite undeniable. Brandy in cold water may be retained when all else is vomited, and act as a powerful stimulant to an infant. It is not only as a stimulant that small doses of brandy are valuable, but also in the prevention of vomiting.

I think that an unbiased observer must admit that brandy is sometimes very valuable in the bad case of pneumonia.

[Benjamin Knox Rachford, M. D., professor of diseases of children, Ohio Miami College, department of medicine of the University of Cincinnati; pediatrician to the Cincinnati Hospital; ex-president of the American Pediatric Society, etc. Diseases of Children, 1912.]

Whisky or brandy should be given in all cases of broncho-pneumonia. In a long-continued disease, such as broncho-pneumonia, where the child is necessarily underfed, whisky serves as a food; it keeps up the strength and prevents excessive waste of tissues.

In acute cardiac dilatation, alcohol in the form of good whisky or brandy is of value.

In lobar pneumonia in underfed infants whisky or brandy is indicated from the beginning of the disease.

In typhoid fever, where the digestive capacity is such that the child is underfed, alcohol should be used, not as a stimulant, but as a food.

[Chalmers Watson, M. D., F. R. C. P. E., assistant physician Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh, editor of the Encyclopedica Medica, etc. Food and Feeding in Health and Disease, 1913.]

There is no question of the undoubted value of alcohol in the treatment of certain diseases, more especially in their critical stages.

In certain acute fevers such as pneumonia, diphtheria, and the like, when the circulation is distinctly failing, the administration of alcohol is followed by a material improvement in the general condition of the patient.

Diphtheria is such a treacherous disease that it is advisable to have recourse to the use of stimulants if there is the least dissatisfaction with the condition of the patient.

In weak, elderly subjects, with bronchitis or with chronic heart disease, a little whisky, brandy, or dry champagne is of great value as a stimulant. It may have at the same time a sedative effect and promote sleep.

Alcohol is sometimes of considerable value in cases of failure of digestive power. A glass of beer or stout, given with one or two meals daily for a time, is occasionally of distinct value, acting as a bitter tonic and at the same time supplying a relatively large amount of nutriment in fluid form.

In protracted convalescence from some acute diseases, a glass of beer, a little whisky, or a glass of wine taken with the chief meals, may improve the tone of the digestion and accelerate the rate of recovery.

[Robert Hutchison, M. D., F. R. C. P. Edin., physician to the London Hospital, physician to the Hospital for Sick Children, London. Food: The Principles of Dietetics, 1917.]

Bottled stout is an ideal soporific. I scarcely ever met with a man who could withstand the soporific effects of bottled stout. It is far better than opium and induces a more nearly natural sleep.

If a little bitter beer or glass of wine at meals increases the mother's appetite and her power of digesting ordinary food, then such an addition to her diet will improve her own nutrition and with it the composition of her milk.

Alcohol certainly spares fat and sometimes carbohydrate and yields heat and energy to the body. Of this fact there is no longer any doubt, and it at once entitles alcohol to rank as a food.

(Quoting Matthew Arnold:) "Wine used in moderation seems to add to the agreeableness of life, and whatever adds to the agreeableness of life adds to its resources and power."

It is in conditions just short of health, however, in old age, overwork, and fatigue that the beneficial effects of alcohol become more marked.

As regards the form in which alcohol should be used, beer seems to be most natural for youth, wine in the middle life, whilst spirits may be reserved for the aged.

As long as the efficiency of the heart is improved by its administration, alcohol is doing good. In fever its power of lowering temperature and its calming influence on the brain are also of use.

There are also grounds for the belief that alcohol actually increases the resisting power of the body to the poisons of certain diseases, such, for example, as septic fevers.

We have the clinical experience of good observers, who regard alcohol as being actually an antidote to acute erysipelas.

In some chronic diseases, such as diabetes, alcohol is used as a real food to replace a certain amount of carbohydrate in the diet, whilst in others it is chiefly its tonic influence on digestion which one seeks to obtain.

Hippocrates recognized the value of wine in fever, and since his time it has been pretty generally employed.

In some special diseases such as malaria, erysipelas, and septic poisoning, alcohol seems to increase the resisting power of the patient, and is almost always indicated on that account.

In some forms of delirium bottled stout seems to exert a peculiarly sedative influence.

[Robert F. Williams, M. A., M. D., professor of practice of medicine in the Medical College of Virginia, etc. Food and Diet in Health and Disease, 1906.]

In tuberculosis, alcohol lowers temperature somewhat by increasing the cutaneous circulation, and through this same action it often lessens night sweats and insomnia. These effects are beneficial and constitute the indications for its use. Good beer, porter, or ale is permissible when it is preferred by the patient, especially in warm weather, and it is often more efficient than wine or spirits in stimulating the appetite. It is useful also, given at bedtime, for preventing sleeplessness.

[A. A. Stevens, A. M., M. D., professor of therapeutics and clinical medicine, Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania; lecturer on physical diagnosis in the University of Pennsylvania, etc. Materia Medica and Therapeutics, 1909.]

Alcohol is employed internally as a diffusible circulatory stimulant, a stomachic, a food, and a chemical antidote.

Externally it is used as an antiseptic, a stimulant, a hemostatic, and an antihydrotic.

In all forms of sudden heart failure, as in syncope, shock, snake bite, and acute febrile diseases, alcohol is an invaluable stimulant.

In the continued fevers, like typhoid, it fills a triple rôle; it serves as a food, as a general stimulant, and as a promoter of digestion.

In chronic diseases, like phthisis, obstinate atonic dyspepsia, and valvular affections of the heart, it often does good.

Hops act as a bitter tonic and as a feeble hypnotic. In the restlessness of fevers they are sometimes useful sedatives.

In tuberculosis, malt liquors and wines are usually the best preparations of alcohol when digestion is good, but when the digestive power is feeble whisky or brandy is preferable.

[William Tibbles, M. D., L. L. D., L. R. C. P., M. R. C. S., L. S. A., Medical officer of health, fellow of the Royal Institute of Public Health, London, etc. Dietetics, or Food in Health and Disease, 1914.]

Alcohol is primarily an appetizer. It sharpens the palate and increases the desire for and enjoyment of food, and to that extent is beneficial.

Convalescent, debilitated, or aged persons frequently eat more food when it is accompanied by a glass of beer, wine, or diluted spirits.

The value of such a beverage to those who need stimulation, and especially to those whose occupation is sedentary, is admitted by most scientific men.

Alcohol is a rapid and trustworthy restorative.

In many cases it is truly life-preserving, owing to its power to sustain cardiac and nervous energy. It may help a patient through the crisis of pneumonia or enteric fever by stimulating the flagging circulation, soothing the nervous system, producing sleep, enlivening the mind, and encouraging the patient.

In pneumonia, if the pulse becomes small, rapid, feeble, and irregular, the breathing embarrassed, the lips and nose cyanosed, alcohol is a valuable ally and as necessary as strychnine, musk, ether, digitalis, and oxygen.

In many cases of insomnia, a glass of whisky or stout is a good sedative.

In neuralgia and other cases of nervous irritability, wine, ale, or stout is beneficial.

Beer, ale, and stout, by virtue of their taste, aromatic bitters, and tonics, give a relish to food, increase appetite, and promote the flow of saliva. To this extent they assist digestion. They are useful to convalescents, those enfeebled by chronic diseases, and the aged. They are of some value to those whose stomach has lost tone by overwork, rush, and worry, and to sufferers from neuralgia and insomnia.

Claret is of value in all cases of debility, not merely as a stimulant but as a genuine tonic and restorative. It is of value in cases of anemia, general debility, overwork, enfeebled digestion, and similar ailments. It is valuable in atonic and bilious forms of indigestion, diarrhea, and relaxed conditions of all mucous membranes.

In shock alcohol plays a useful part in improving the circulation.

As an aid to digestion, alcoholic beverages may be useful during convalescence and in old people, when it will be found to increase the appetite and the secretion of the gastric juice.

As a cardiac stimulant, alcohol is useful in acute febrile disorders, such as typhoid and pneumonia.

It is in acute febrile disorders, also, that the value of alcohol for inducing sleep is best seen. The production of sleep by alcohol in these conditions is most valuable for restoring the nervous system.

Another valuable action of alcohol in acute febrile disturbances is its value as a foodstuff.

For relief in asthma, hot rum and milk, hot whisky, water, and lemon are very useful forms.

The elaborate experiments of Atwater and Benedict are conclusive that alcohol is an easily assimilable foodstuff.

In some cases of diabetes alcohol has been shown to reduce the acetonuria and glucose excretion; and consequently it may be of some value in such cases as a food.

[Abstract from editorial in Medical Brief, St. Louis, July, 1918.]

There is, however, one point overlooked in regard to the rôle of beer in the dietary. It contains a material amount of diet deficiency substances of the order of vitamines, and investigations have shown that beer added to the dietary increased the assimilation of the nonnitrogenous foodstuffs, and particularly of fats, while alcohol in moderate amount increased protein absorption from nitrogenous foods. Then, again, beer has undoubtedly a condimental action and often makes the simple meal attractive, if it is only bread and cheese. Thus regarded, beer, instead of representing a waste of food materials from which it is made, may actually effect an economy in inducing in those whose custom it is to drink it a better appreciation of the food they consume. In the recent bitter controversy about the merits and demerits of beer, this consideration should not be left out of the equation, in justice to the beer drinkers, who are modest in their demands for the national beverage.

Alcohol yields about as much heat and energy as the fats. To a large extent it is burned up in the body, and under certain circumstances may yield to the organism its energy, and is in this sense a food.

The beers contains anywhere from 2 to 5 per cent alcohol, but also a considerable percentage of carbohydrates, and are therefore of some value as a food.

Alcohol is useful as a fugacious stimulant, as in collapse, mainly because of its indirect action upon the heart. It sometimes aids in quieting delirium in the acute infectious diseases. In small doses it improves digestion temporarily by acting as a stomachic.

Alcohol has long been used to abort a cold. It is of some value for this.

In certain well-selected cases of tuberculosis, alcohol has the merit of stimulating digestion and influencing metabolism.

Extract of malt has considerable food value. It is said to be extremely valuable to increase the milk of nursing mothers, and may be tried in cases of malnutrition.

Clinical experience too great to be ignored stands for the continued employment of alcohol.

In recent experiments carried out by the author he was able to show that alcohol produces a distinct increase in the bacteriolitic power of the blood in disease, probably by increasing the activity of the complemental body. This is perhaps the explanation of the good results which follow the use of the drug in medicine. The chief uses of the drug are as a rapidly acting equalizer of the circulation in all forms of circulatory failure due to shock or poisons and as a systemic support in low fevers and prolonged wasting diseases, in old age, and in convalescence from acute disease.

In pneumonias alcohol is useful, and particularly is this true when these affections occur in alcoholics.

Some additional conditions in which alcohol is indicated are fainting, snake bites, surgical shock, pneumonia in its later stages, and excessive wasting due to prolonged suppuration.

In exhausting fevers, such as typhus and typhoid, alcohol finds its true usefulness.

In persistent vomiting the use of small doses of brandy will often do good.

Stout and porter are of value in wasting diseases, in convalescence from acute diseases, and for nursing women.

Hops are used as antispasmodics and nervous sedatives in cases of hysteria and nervousness.

In constipation beers differ in their properties, some of them increasing and some of them decreasing intestinal activity.

[A. A. Brill, Ph. B., M. D., assistant professor of psychiatry, New York Post Graduate Medical School and Hospital, lecturer on abnormal psychology, New York University, etc. Miscellaneous writings, 1918.]

Alcohol has an indisputable place in the human physiological and psychological economy. I know of no other drug which will replace it in certain conditions. In states of exhaustion there is no other drug that can be used with more benefit and less danger than alcohol in proper dose. This fact alone would justify its continued use as a therapeutic agent.

My experience with hundreds of chronic alcoholics has taught me that alcoholism is merely a symptom of some underlying condition. If these individuals did not use alcohol to excess they would probably do something worse, such as commit crimes or resort to drug using, which is infinitely worse for society.

Every normally adjusted person uses alcohol as intelligently as he uses any other food, and upon him it undoubtedly exerts a salutary effect.

Beer, ale, and porter have served me well in cases of insomnia, where I hesitated to employ strong narcotics. They have also acted admirably in innumerable cases of general exhaustion, being mildly stimulating and possessing undoubted nourishing properties and encouraging the taking of additional foods. In this way they are valuable therapeutic agents.

Alcohol is an enormous social and psychological benefactor. By its proper use it has undoubtedly served as a safety valve for the masses by varying the monotony of life and thereby making life more bearable.

Alcohol has probably kept more persons out of insane asylums than it ever brought to them.

Malt liquors—ale, stout, and beer—contain diastase, which aids the digestion of starchy foods. They are especially tonic in effect.

The older view is that alcohol is a valuable agent when judiciously employed, and that they are especially indicated as stimulants in cases of fatigue, in convalescence from acute diseases, in persons who live a sedentary life, or who suffer from poor digestion, and in others who are prostrated from acute illness. In all these cases a glass of wine or a little brandy diluted with water taken shortly before or with the food is thought to stimulate digestive organs and enable the patient to take more food. The disinfecting properties of alcohol are asserting themselves increasingly.

[Harvey W. Wiley, M. D., Ph. D., Washington, D. C. Foods and Their Adulteration, 1918.]

It is popularly believed in many countries where fermented beverages are commonly consumed that the addition of wine or beer to the diet of the mother is beneficial in improving the quality of the milk and also sustaining the strength of the mother for her extra duties.

The use of alcohol in moderate quantities does not give rise to the presence of any alcohol whatever in the milk. Hence there is no danger usually of administering alcohol to the child by giving it to the mother.

It is doubtless true that the character of the mother's milk may be somewhat modified by the use of alcoholic beverages or alcoholic malt extracts. Experiments have shown that alcoholic beverages tend, perhaps, to increase the fat and to a less extent the protein.

There are some cases of ill health in which the advice to drink fermented beverages has been given and followed with benefit, especially if the mother, before the birth of the child, has been in the habit of using a moderate amount of alcohol. In such cases perhaps it is not advisable to prohibit entirely the use of these articles during the period of lactation.

Used externally alcohol relieves some forms of headache, prevents or allays local inflammation, obviates threatening bed sores and cracked nipples, relieves itching in some skin diseases. As a liniment it is of value to aid the absorption of inflammatory products, gives nutrition to the tissues, and acts as a counterirritant in such conditions as bronchitis, pneumonia, and pleurisy. It is also of use in relieving pain.

Internally alcohol is used as a local astringent anodyne and antiseptic in many mouth and throat diseases.

Brandy relieves toothache and tonsillitis.

Port wine is used as a gargle in mercurial salivation and inflamed gums.

As a digestive stimulant alcohol may be given in small doses just before or during meals to convalescents with weakened appetite and digestion.

Patients suffering from chronic wasting diseases, town dwellers leading a sedentary life, and old and overworked persons can be benefited by alcohol.

In painful dyspepsia, vomiting of pregnancy, and flatulence, champagne or brandy and soda water is sometimes useful. A good peg of brandy or whisky often relieves gastric spasms.

Fainting, syncope, or threatened collapse may be aborted by a single large dose of whisky or brandy. As a cardiac stimulant brandy or whisky is used in threatening cardiac failure.

Diarrhea or cholera, in the beginning, may be checked by a stiff dose of brandy.

As a hypnotic, alcohol may be used at bedtime.

The various malt extracts are chiefly valuable for foods for persons suffering from wasting diseases, such as phthisis.

[Alfred C. Croftan, M. D., author of Clinical Urology. Clinical Therapeutics. 1910.]

When the gastric juice is deficient, small quantities of alcoholic beverages are useful. In chronic varieties they act as a stimulus, increase the appetite, and materially aid in the digestion of fats.

Alcohol seems to be particularly useful in profound sepsis that threatens to produce heart collapse.

In Bright's disease, alcohol should be eliminated, as far as possible, but among subjects who have been used to drinking beer all their lives the occasional use of a glass of beer can, of course, do no great harm.

In influenza, a little whisky and water throughout the course of the disease aids materially in counteracting the heart weakness and symptoms of nervous depression that so commonly supervene in influenza.

In some forms of nervous diarrhea a small glass of brandy or liqueur is often efficacious in warding off the attack and also in preventing the occurrence of the other nervous symptoms.

For the night sweats of tuberculosis, brandy or whisky in milk or water is occasionally of value in stopping profuse perspiration during the night.

Alcohol, too, is a food which should not be omitted from the fare of tuberculous cases. It is best given in the form of diluted spirits or claret, or light wine diluted with water. Beer, owing to the percentage of carbohydrate it contains, is a particularly useful beverage and may be taken with impunity. It is especially useful in the evening on account of the slight soporific effect.

In tuberculosis, a very simple and generally efficient means of combating slight rises of temperature is the administration of alcohol, preferably in the form of hot toddy, whenever the premonitory signs occur; also in the form of a light Burgundy or Moselle wine as a table beverage. Early cases of tuberculosis, in my experience, are not so apt to develop so much fever, and especially very high degrees of temperature, if they use some alcohol as when they do not.

[George F. Butler, A. M., Ph. G., M. D., professor and head of the department of therapeutics and professor of preventive and clinical medicine, Chicago College of Medicine and Surgery; medical department, Valparaiso University, etc. Materia Medica, Pharmacology, and Therapeutics. 1908.]

Alcohol in the form of wine, beer, or ale, taken before or during meals, is an efficient stomachic. Atonic dyspepsia and the weakened digestion attendant upon convalescence from acute diseases are generally benefited by some form of alcohol. When digestion becomes impaired as the result of physical or mental exhaustion, the drug serves a useful purpose.

As a pure cardiac stimulant alcohol is remarkably serviceable in syncope, asphyxia, exhausting hemorrhages, diphtheria, and collapse when death seems imminent.

In certain stages of various acute diseases alcohol is one of the most potent and useful remedies.

Small quantities of alcohol appear to exert a favorable action in functional impotence.

Its sedative action renders alcohol valuable as a hypnotic. It is a very useful hypnotic in the delirium of the acute infectious diseases.

The principal therapeutic use for alcohol, perhaps, is as a cardiac stimulant. In syncope, shock particularly, it is invaluable.

In acute colds, alcohol may restore balance.

As a stomachic, either claret, beer, or ale is most useful in improving the appetite.

[H. Edward Lewis, M. D., editor of American Medicine; formerly instructor in chemistry and dietetics, Fanny Allen Hospital Training School for Nurses; formerly attending physician New York Nose, Throat, and Lung Hospital, etc. Diet for the Sick, 1916.]

It is generally conceded that alcohol posseses food value and when taken in small quantity is completely oxidized in the system. Careful experiments seem to indicate that it retards waste by sparing the wear and tear of tissue proteids. Consequently its value in febrile conditions and acute wasting diseases is sometimes very great.

In fevers it not only repairs the tissue waste, but also sustains the heart and nervous system and aids in lowering the temperature.

It is an available, convenient, and rapidly acting agent in heart failure. For this purpose brandy or whisky is preferable.

Small continued doses are often useful in chronic heart affections.

Its stimulating properties are of service in pneumonia, typhoid fever, erysipelas, puerperal fever, and in nearly all acute diseases of elderly people and cachectics; in a word, wherever there is debility and a tendency to collapse.

Ale, stout, and porter have a special tonic effect, and the diastase they contain aids the digestion of starchy foods.

Alcohol has also proven useful in hemoptysis and uterine hemorrhage.

It has been recommended by some authorities for children in capillary bronchitis, broncho-pneumonia, pneumonia, and choleroid forms of diarrhea.

[Walter A. Bastedo, Ph. G., M. D., assistant professor of clinical medicine, Columbia University; associate attending physician, St. Lukes Hospital, New York; attending physician, City Hospital, New York; formerly curator New York Botanical Garden, etc. Materia Medica and Pharmacology, 1918.]

Externally, alcohol is of value as an antiseptic, as in cleaning surgeons' hands or the skin of a patient. As a cooling lotion in headache and itching skin diseases. For rubbing the body of an invalid. In sweating of the hands and feet, and in the night sweats of tuberculosis. As a preventive of carbolic acid burns, alcohol is the best remedy.

For their effect on appetite and digestion alcohol drinks may be employed in convalescence and debility and in conditions of diminished gastric secretion; for their carminative action in flatulence and colic; for their reflex stimulating effect in fainting and faintness.

For systemic effect whisky or brandy is most employed as follows:

1. To prevent or check a cold.

2. To furnish food and stimulation in depressed conditions from acute illness.

3. As a narcotic and sedative in states of nervousness, restlessness, or delirium.

4. As a hypnotic in mild chronic forms of insomnia as from mental work late at night or continued nervous strain (beer, ale, or whisky, taken at bedtime).

5. In fever as an antipyretic and food, and as a narcotic to allay nervousness and promote quiet and sleep.

6. In shock.

In sickness it is equally imperative to use judgment before cutting off the alcohol from a drinker; it will not do; for example, to stop the whisky of a chronic drinker during an attack of pneumonia.

The hops used in the manufacture of beer contribute to its hypnotic power.

Lupulin, derived from hops, is used as a bitter, a mild sedative and antispasmodic in the treatment of nervousness, restlessness, and hysteria.

[Louis Kolipinski, M. D., Washington, D. C. New York Medical News, Oct. 5, 1901.]

In acute vomiting the action of lager beer is certain, and intolerance rare. Its after effects, as everyone knows, are soporific. The beneficial effects are most marked in women and in those who are not habitual users of alcohol. Dark beer is preferable. A bottle or two suffices. Singularly good results can be obtained from small doses. This is illustrated in the attacks of nausea, bilious vomiting, vertigo, and sleeplessness, often a striking syndrome of epidemic influenza. A wineglass of beer repeated in half an hour will immediately soothe the distressed organ and give a night of refreshing sleep.

In a patient with very severe and persistent vomiting of four days' duration, caused by an inflamed ovary, relief came after the patient had taken the contents of three bottles of beer.

Beer, ale, and porter are much and justly esteemed as stomachic tonics and restoratives in chronic wasting diseases; for example, in convalescence from acute diseases and surgical injuries, in cases of profuse and protracted suppuration, prolonged lactation, diseases of the joints, scrofula, phthisis, etc.

Alcoholic beverages only increase the amount of fats in the mother's milk and not the quantity of the milk as a whole.

When wakefulness is due to cerebral anemia, a glass of beer or ale at bedtime will frequently produce satisfactory sleep.

Puerperal mania, delirium tremens, and acute maniacal delirium, when coexisting with a condition of adynamia, are greatly benefited by the use of ale. The effect of this remedy is to arouse the appetite, to quiet delirium, and produce sleep.

Alcohol in small doses is a useful stomachic tonic. It is especially serviceable in the feeble digestion of old people, the atonic dyspepsia of the sedentary, and in the slow and inefficient digestion of convalescents from acute diseases.

Summer diarrhea, both of adults and children, may be arrested by a full dose of brandy. The vomiting of cholera morbus and cholera may frequently be arrested by small doses of iced brandy. Other forms of vomiting, as, for example, the vomiting of pregnancy, can sometimes be relieved by the same remedy.

Alcohol in some form is constantly prescribed in low conditions in fevers, acute inflammations, and depressing maladies of all kinds.

Alcohol is a narcotic. It may be used to relieve pain, promote sleep, and to quiet delirium.

As alcohol stops waste, promotes constructive metamorphosis by increasing the appetite and the digestive power, and favors the deposition of fat, it is directly indicated in chronic wasting diseases, especially in phthisis. Clinical experience is in accord with physiological data.

Alcohol is an important remedy in the various forms of pulmonary phthisis.

In convalescence from acute diseases there can be no difference of opinion as to the great value of wine as a restorative.

In wasting diseases wines serve a double purpose—they stimulate the activity of the primary assimilation and, within certain limits, they are used as foods.

[John William Springthorpe, M. A., M. D., M. R. C. P., senior physician to the Melbourne Australian Hospital; lecturer on therapeutics, dietetics, and hygiene; and dean of the faculty of dentistry in the University of Melbourne, etc., Therapeutics, Dietetics, and Hygiene, 1914.]

Alcohol increases the flow of the saliva and the acids, solids, and total amount of the gastric juice, which it also renders strongly proteolytic.

The constant search of all mankind has been after satisfaction. The only permanent way out of dissastisfaction is through the removal of the cause, a course, however, which from inheritance or circumstances is frequently impossible. The dissatisfaction may be subjective or objective, subtle or simple, recognized or unrecognized, it matters not which or how or why. But in the knowledge, or the power, or the inclination as to how to gain contentment and happiness in this the only lasting manner, resort is had to what experience has shown temporarily removes the perception of numberless skin pricks and gives a sense of well-being. It may be true that the amelioration is not genuine, still it satisfies while it lasts, and though to the scientist the paradise is a fool's one, still to the individual it is not only real but often also the only one attainable.

It is this transforming stimulo-sedative action that seems to be the explanation and justification of its universal use. Philosophically, alcohol is the characteristic stimulo sedative which seems to bring happiness and promote satisfaction. And in their practical dealing with human conditions, resort will continue to be had by brainy men and women to some such magician until the millenium appears in which all are satisfactorily situated, all know what is best for them, all can promptly secure it, and all are prepared to do so.

In addition to alcohol, beers contain sufficient extractives to give them food value, whilst the bitter, narcotic principle of hops renders them sedative as well as hypnotic. They are therefore foods as well as beverages and best suited for those who have to work hard for a living.

Spirits are a little less than an alcohol of 50 per cent strength, and one of the greatest dietetic reforms now in progress is their replacement by light wines and still lighter ales.

Alcohol in small quantities aids digestion and absorption. For the indigestion of the aged and feeble or for those who are thoroughly exhausted by overwork it is very valuable. It is also useful because it increases the appetite and it is a food which is absorbed without previous digestion. It may relieve painful indigestion and check vomiting. Brandy and water will often check diarrhea.

Alcohol may be used as a soporific, relieving insomnia.

Alcohol has been largely used in all sorts of febrile conditions.

Extract of malt is a very valuable food, especially for persons who are suffering from wasting diseases and have feeble digestion. It is easily tolerated by the stomach.

The fevered patient may take as much malt extract as he can without upsetting the digestion.

In typhoid fever there are very few cases that are not the better for a glass or two of port wine daily during the early part of convalescence. Restlessness and sleeplessness will sometimes be relieved by a full dose of brandy or whisky given with the food. We have seen an ounce of brandy send a convalescent sleepless patient to sleep in a few minutes.

In aortic insufficiency supporting foods and a moderate amount of alcoholic stimulants are necessary.

In acute anemia that follows hemorrhage warm brandy and water will be a good diffusible stimulant.

In simple anemia a certain amount of wine will be found useful, both as a stimulant and sedative; or a glass of porter or stout may sometimes be taken with advantage at bedtime with a biscuit.

In angina pectoris, at the onset of an attack give some warm diffusible stimulant, such as a little brandy or whisky in peppermint water.

In dysentery a teaspoonful of brandy with a little warm coffee is an excellent stimulant.

In acute bronchial catarrh warm, weak alcoholic drinks are needed to keep up the force of the circulation, while at the same time they favor diaphoresis, reduce fever, and promote expectoration.

In chorea alcohol in moderation should be given in severe cases when exhaustion is threatened.

In scurvy wine, beer, and cider all have some influence for good.

In diabetes, in mild cases, a little nonsaccharine wine, or small quantities of whisky, brandy, or gin may be substituted if required.

In diphtheria any indications of heart failure must be met by an increase in the amount of wine or brandy, which should be given at short intervals, until the action of the heart improves.

Alcohol has a well-known power of inducing sleep. A glass of bitter ale or stout at bedtime or a tablespoonful or two of sound whisky with hot water will frequently have the effect of inducing sleep.

We shall encounter very few cases of phthisis which are not benefited at some period of their course by the discreet administration of alcoholic stimulants.

When the patient is able to drink fermented malt liquors he may be allowed daily two or three glasses of sound bitter beer, porter, or stout; of wine, half a pint to a pint of really good Bordeaux or Burgundy, or of some of the better description of Hungarian, Italian, or Greek wines.

In febrile cases of phthisis small quantities of alcohol given frequently have an excellent effect in supporting the strength, and especially during the night it is important to give two or three tablespoonfuls of brandy or whisky.

[Reynold Webb Wilcox, M. A., M. D., LL. D., D. C. L., president of the American College of Physicians; retired professor of medicine of the New York Post Graduate Medical School and Hospital; formerly president of the Association of the Medical Reserve Corps, United States Army, etc. Materia Medica and Therapeutics, 1917.]

Used with careful discrimination alcohol is one of the most valuable remedies we possess. It is of many instances of service in increasing the appetite and improving the digestion, especially in the sedentary, aged, and feeble, and in instances of exhaustion from acute disease or overwork.

It may relieve gastric pain and allay nausea and vomiting.

In diarrheal affections in adults, as well as children, brandy is at times very useful. It may relieve intestinal colic.

Alcohol is of immense advantage in many instances of febrile diseases, where during critical periods it sustains the vital powers.

There are many instances where it is of inestimable value in such affections as typhoid and typhus fever, pneumonia, smallpox, cholera, and diphtheria, as well as in gangrene, pyemia, and septicemia.

It is likewise of the highest usefulness to arouse and support the flagging powers in sudden depression of the system, and is thus resorted to in shock, syncope, severe hemorrhage, and poisoning.

In many instances of tuberculosis and other wasting diseases it is a remedy of the greatest service, lessening tissue waste, and in general tending to retard the progress of the disease.

The narcotic effect of alcohol upon the nervous system may be employed to relieve pain, to promote sleep, and quiet delirium.

Hops are carminative, and the bitter principle likewise adds to the stomachic properties of the drug. It has an undoubted sedative and hypnotic influence and may sometimes be employed with advantage in hysteria, flatulent colic, and mild diarrheas. As malt liquors contain malt extract as well as hops, an aromatic bitter, their nutritive, tonic, and stomachic qualities are greater than those of spirits or wine.

[D. H. Bergey, A. M., M. D., D. P. H., assistant professor of hygiene and bacteriology, University of Pennsylvania, etc. Principles of Hygiene, 1918.]

Physiologic experiments have demonstrated that the alcoholic beverages may be regarded as articles of food, not only on account of the alcohol present but also on account of the extractives they contain.

They serve to stimulate the digestion, the circulation, and the nervous system.

They also diminish the oxidation processes of the body and lower the temperature. Small amounts of alcohol may be taken daily in the food, and, according to Prof. Atwater's experiments, these small amounts are oxidized in the system and are therefore a source of energy.

[Torald Sollman, M. D., professor pharmacology and materia medica in the School of Medicine of Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio. Pharmacology, Therapeutics, and Toxicology, 1917.]

Alcohol in proper doses has been considered a true stimulant, and this opinion is still held by eminent pharmacologists. Its usefulness as a quickly acting stimulant can scarcely be doubted in the various forms of sudden circulatory collapse, syncope, exhaustion, hemorrhage, traumatic shock, snake venom, poisonings, etc. The narcotic action is also useful in these conditions.

In chronic heart disease small doses may be valuable to lessen the worries of the patient, especially if he has been accustomed to its use.

In exhausting fevers the intelligent and discriminating employment of alcohol should be useful. The beneficial effects are probably mainly nutrient, due to the direct food value of the alcohol and to the stimulation of the digestion and the absorption of other foods. This not only conserves the general nutrition of the patient but also increases the support of the exhausted heart.

The narcotic action of alcohol is useful by quieting the febrile excitement, thus reducing the demands on the strength of the patient.

Dilute alcoholic beverages, wine, and especially beer, increase the flow of urine.

Taken after the exposure to cold alcohol favors the absorption of external heat and also prevents the tendency to congestion of internal organs and thereby the tendency to "catch cold."

Moderate doses of alcohol act as "condiment" or stimulant to digestion. Therefore in some forms of indigestion wine or diluted spirits are of value.

In convalescence and debility the value of alcohol is supported by long experience.

It increases the comfort and the well-being of the patient and starts him on the way to improvement. The feeling of well-being caused by it, the sense of capability, the removal of worry, the enjoyment of the act of taking it, the rest and sleep induced by its narcotic action, its food value and its beneficial effects upon digestion, all concur in its action. To this may be added its slight but certain effects upon the vascular system, the altered distribution of blood, the diminished resistance to the heart—which may be of benefit in some cases. For these purposes, the alcohol should be taken well diluted, as light wines or beers.

In hypochondria, melancholia, neuralgia, and other obscure nervous diseases, alcohol relieves the patient by its mild narcotic and euphoristic action.

Alcohol, especially in the form of beer, taken at night, in the absence of excitement, is a fairly efficient hypnotic, producing less derangement than most other hypnotics.

Beer owes its marked hypnotic qualities to the lupulin of the hops, as well as to the alcohol.

It may be considered as probable that a certain amount of alcohol, variable in different cases, may be taken daily without any demonstrable permanently injurious effects.

[Horatio C. Wood, M. D., LL. D., emeritus professor of materia medica and therapeutics in the University of Pennsylvania, etc.; and Horatio C. Wood, jr., M. D., associate professor of pharmacology in the University of Pennsylvania, etc.; assistant physician to the Philadelphia General Hospital, etc. Therapeutics, 1908.]

In a certain sense alcohol is a food. It must be considered as a food capable to some extent of replacing hydrocarbons.

Its chief therapeutic value in acute disease is a stimulant, a temporary imparter of power, to bridge over some period of weakness.

It is especially adapted for cases in which there is temporary loss of heart power, in acute diseases in which the powers of the system are in danger of being used up, and in those cases when death is threatened from cardiac failure in poisoning by toxins, venoms, and drugs.

In the advanced stages of pneumonia, pyemia, and exanthematous fevers, and other acute diseases, when the typhoid state is well developed, alcohol should be given boldly, to quiet by stimulation the nervous and circulatory systems, to afford a food, to aid digestion, and to aid in lowering temperature; in a word, to enable the system to stand the drain upon its vital powers and at the same time to check such drain.

The chief legitimate uses of alcohol in chronic diseases are to aid in digestion, to furnish a food which, without any digestive effort on the part of the system, shall be absorbed and shall take the place of more ordinary food, and to check excessive tissue waste.

In phthisis, and its cogenor, scrofulosis, it is probable that the use of ale may often prove beneficial, and in the latter stages of consumption its judicious use as an antipyretic, narcotic, stimulant to lessen the sufferings of the patient is perfectly justifiable.

The experience of almost every trout fisherman, has satisfied him that spirits do have power to prevent "catching cold" under sudden and unaccustomed exposure to wet and cold, and that benumbed extremities will become warm and have their proper feelings returned under the influence of a glass of whisky.

The question of choice as to which form of alcohol to be used has seemed to us to depend simply upon the personal likings of the patient, to which, therefore, the choice may well be left.

Hops are a bitter tonic and a very feeble narcotic, which have been given to quiet nervous irritability and to strengthen digestion in neurasthena, and even delirium tremens.

Alcohol may be used as a rapidly acting equalizer of the circulation in all forms of circulatory failure due to shock or poisons, and as a systemic support in low fevers and prolonged wasting diseases, in old age, and in convalescence from acute disease.

In both croupous and catarrhal pneumonia it is useful, and particularly is this true when these affections occur in alcoholics.

Alcohol is indicated in fainting, snake bites, surgical shock, and excessive wasting due to prolonged suppuration.

In exhausting fevers such as typhoid and typhus, alcohol finds its true usefulness.

In the atonic indigestion of nervous and depressed subjects and in cholera infantum, good brandy is universally found to be beneficial.

In persistent vomiting small doses of brandy on cracked ice will often give relief.

Hops are used as antispasmodics and nervous sedatives in cases of hysteria and nervousness.

In diabetes, Janeway finds that a patient will digest more fats when alcohol is allowed him than when he does not take alcohol, and, in fact, finds that patients on a starch-free diet who must take large amounts of fat can not digest it without alcohol. Of course, alcohol also furnishes heat to the body.

In tropical dysentery, when the temperature is low and the patient feels cold, small doses of brandy may cause a feeling of warmth to the patient and the relief of internal congestion. It may prevent collapse from occurring.

Alcohol also has a food value.

[George Sheever Shattuck, M. D., assistant physician to the Massachusetts Hospital, etc. Principles of Medical Treatment, 1916.]

In cardiac insufficiency, slight exaccerbations of dyspnea or distress can often be relieved by a quickly acting diffusible stimulant, as aromatic spirits of ammonia or whisky or brandy.

In circulatory disorders in the infectious diseases, emaciated patients, capable of taking little food, sometimes do well on large doses of alcohol, which seem to act for them as a food, and indirectly as a stimulant.

In typhoid fever, emaciated or septic patients, taking little food, may do well on alcohol.

[Samuel O. L. Potter, A. M., M. D., M. R. C. P., London, formerly professor of the principles and practice of medicine in the Cooper Medical College of San Francisco; late major and surgeon of volunteers, United States Army, etc.; and Elmer H. Funk, M. D., associate in medicine, Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, assistant physician to the Philadelphia Hospital, etc. Therapeutics, Materia Medica, and Pharmacy, 1917.]

In small quantities taken just before or during a meal, alcohol is an efficient aid to digestion, especially in the aged and feeble and persons who are greatly exhausted by overwork.

In the atonic indigestion of nervous and depressed subjects, and in cholera infantum, good brandy is beneficial.

In the form of a sparkling wine, as champagne, or as brandy and soda water, alcohol may control vomiting from any cause, especially that of yellow fever and seasickness.

A single dose of strong whisky or brandy is often a very efficient combatant of fainting or of collapse.

Diarrhea of simple form may be checked by a dram of good brandy.

An attack of acute coryza or a cold from exposure, beginning with a chill, may frequently be aborted by a full dose of spirits in hot water.

In anemia and chlorisis good red wines are almost indispensable, also in convalescence from acute diseases, sudden hemorrhage, and many other morbid conditions.

In phthisis alcohol does good service if it promotes assimilation and assists digestion.

It is invaluable in poisoning by cardiac depressants and snake venom and impending cardiac failure from any cause.

Alcohol is the most efficient antidote in poisoning from carbolic acid.

In fevers, alcohol is often very serviceable. Its powers of supplying energy, of being itself oxidized in the body and acting as a food, of reducing body temperature and promoting respiration and sleep, are all indications for its beneficial employment in many febrile conditions, while its stimulant action on the heart may be available in such diseases as typhoid fever and lobar pneumonia.

It is an absolute necessity in the treatment of acute lobar pneumonia, if the patient has been accustomed to its use.

Some physicians agree with Mr. Lawson Tait, who declared himself "fully persuaded, after 30 years of life as hard in work and as full of responsibility as well could be, that the moderate use of alcohol is a necessity in our modern life."

Dr. Robert Farquharson sums up the case for moderate drinking as follows: "All stimulant is unnecessary for the young and for people living perfectly healthy lives, but under the stress and struggle of modern civilization, few of us beyond middle age are placed under normal physiological conditions, and a little alcohol helps us around the corners and to plane away the asperites of existence. In turns it may be a stimulant, or a sedative, or a tonic, or a digestive, or an actual food; and, unless we run on into excess, no physical damage can be done to our tissues. The argument in its favor, when wisely and prudently used, seems complete. It does us good, and can do us no harm."

Hops are a bitter tonic and a feeble hypnotic and antispasmodic. After slight cerebral excitement they produce calm and a soporific disposition, especially in alcoholic solution. The stomachic and tonic effects are due to the bitter principle, and are found in bitter ale. The primary stimulant and secondary sedative effects are due to the volatile oil, and are also possessed by ales and beer.

Hops are used as a tonic and calmative. In dyspepsia of atonic form hops are an excellent stomachic tonic, and in nervous irritability may be used as a calmative and hypnotic.

[John V. Shoemaker, M. D., LL. D., professor of materia medica, pharmacology, therapeutics, and clinical medicine, and clinical professor of diseases of the skin in the Medico-Chirurgical College of Pennsylvania, etc. Materia Medica and Therapeutics, 1908.]

Malt liquors, ale, beer, porter, etc., contain nutritive material with a small proportion of diastase, which makes them useful in certain cases of weak digestion.

Malt liquors can be taken by those who suffer from the cerebral effects of wine.

To the action upon the digestive organs and the stimulating effect upon the nervous system and the circulation are to be ascribed the usefulness, in the treatment of disease, of alcohol judiciously given. In almost all cases it is intended to act as a restorative.

In phythisis a tolerance seems to exist, and patients can take relatively large quantities of alcohol without showing the symptoms of intoxication. The late Austin Flint reported the case of a young lady who took a pint of whisky daily for nearly two years for pulmonary phthisis and was finally cured.

In measles, when the eruption turns black or hemorrhagic, alcohol is best given in as large doses as will be borne, at short intervals.

In acute inflammations, as in pneumonia, when the heart begins to fail alcohol can usually be given with marked benefit.

In congestion of the lungs, typhoid pneumonia, or pneumonia of the aged, alcoholic stimulation is particularly indicated.

During convalescence from fevers, when the structures of the heart and stomach have been altered by the fever process and digestion is weak, it is often found that malt liquor in some form increases appetite and digestion, improves nutrition, and enables the patient to sleep better at night.

In the same way, persons who follow sedentary occupations and whose bodies are insufficiently nourished often find much benefit from the use of alcohol in moderate quantities, given just before or after or taken with their meals.

Its antiseptic powers are useful in infectious dyspepsia, where digestion is stopped by the growth of microorganisms, which set up excessive fermentation in the stomach and intestinal canal. Its acknowledged value in the zymotic diseases, and preeminently in diphtheria, is partly due to its antiseptic action in the alimentary tract. In similar manner, in cholera epidemics alcohol has decided prophylactic effects.

In cholera infantum, also, brandy exerts an excellent influence; and, indeed, in many bowel diseases among adults alcohol in the form of brandy or red wine is of great assistance.

Alcohol is in some measure antidotal to the poison of bacillus tuberculosis, and it is to this action that its unquestionable value in prolonging life in phthisis is due.

[John H. Musser, jr., B. S., M. D., associate in medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, etc., and Thomas C. Kelly, A. M., M. D., instructor in medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, etc., and many other writers. Practical Treatment, 1917.]

In diabetes, Theodore C. Janeway says, with severe acidosis, whisky or brandy, well diluted, I believe to be of value.

As an article of diet in cardio-vascular disease, alcohol in small quantities is probably a compact and digestible respiratory food.

In weakness of the heart muscle, small amounts of whisky or brandy or wine may be advisable for the psychical effect to those accustomed to them.

In septicemia, as a cardiac stimulant alcohol has long been advocated.

In yellow fever, stimulants are given as indicated, especially strychnine and alcohol.

For the mere insomnia of heart disease, a little port wine, old sherry, sauterne, champagne, or brandy and soda water is often helpful.

Alcohol given before or after the Brand bath in typhoid fever is employed by J. C. Wilson, Tyson, Musser, Stengel, and others, and clinical experience does not seem to justify an objection.

According to Sir Lauder Brunton, Bart., M. D., D. Sc., LL. D., F. R. C. P., F. R. S., alcohol is sometimes a powerful hypnotic, partly by drawing the blood to the stomach and partly by its sedative effect upon the nervous structures themselves.

In collapse, the rapidity of the action of alcohol is a point much in its favor, as it may maintain life long enough to allow slower and more persistent stimulants to act. According to Dr. David L. Edsall, it seems to have been established with a reasonable clearness that the action of alcohol is to serve as a food. It is an energy producer, and thus spares the tissues from consumption. There is, I think, no rational doubt that small doses of alcohol are at times useful with those that are out of health, for their stimulating effect upon the appetite and upon digestion and occasionally for their effect upon other functions.

Beer, ale, stout, and porter usually contain 4.5 to 5.5 of carbohydrate. Consequently, if the other constituents of these preparations do not disturb digestion, the total food intake can often be largely and pleasantly increased by their use.

That the danger of inducing the alcohol habit has to be held in mind is self-evident and important, but with those preparations that contain only a small amount of alcohol this is unlikely with patients that have a reasonable amount of self-control.

According to Dr. Rufus I. Cole, in typhoid fever, in certain cases, especially in those who have been addicted to alcohol, or in the very strong and robust, when a cardiac stimulant is needed, it is well to give alcohol.

According to Sir Clifford Allbutt, in chronic diseases of the heart the fact that alcohol does act as a powerful cordial in heart failure is undeniable by anyone who has averted a faint by a glass of wine or watched its effect upon certain feeble, irregular, and rapid pulses. Alcohol certainly appears to be a potent temporary restorative. Within limits, it is useful also as a concentrated and readily absorbed food. In severe cases of cardiac oppression, physicians whose clinical experience deserves the greatest respect—Broadbent, for example—have relied on alcohol boldly during critical phases, pushing it even to quantities of 10 ounces per diem.

In grave toxic conditions, where the heart is suffering, as we see in the "typhoid state," there can be little doubt that alcohol is often a potent remedy.

Continuing, Sir Allbutt writes: "By all means, let the sufferer have anything that can assuage his miseries in reason; but let him not by blunting his consciousness of them undermine the powers of resistance and hamper the activity of the viscera, on which the amelioration of these miseries directly depends. Let the brandy bottle be kept with the digitalis and the strychnine and other medicines; with the meal a moderate glass of good claret, hock, or light cherry should suffice for cheerfulness. Beer is, perhaps, more advisable in heart disease."

In tuberculosis, according to Edward Osgood Otis, A. B., M. D., alcohol in the form of light wines or diluted whisky or some of the bitter beers taken at mealtime may not only stimulate the appetite but aid digestion.

Quoting Latham, Otis writes: "Experience has shown that alcohol is of the greatest possible service in tuberculosis when fever is present. It saves the body protein, stimulates the appetite, and, in small doses, hastens gastric digestion. It favorably affects the night sweats and sleeplessness. When solid food can not be taken, alcohol is our sheet anchor."

[W. Gilman Thompson, M. D., professor of clinical medicine in the Cornell University Medical College, New York, visiting physician to the Presbyterian and Bellevue Hospitals, etc. Practical Dietetics, 1906.]

As a preventive of drunkenness and the evils of chronic alcoholism, the introduction of the milder malt liquors into this country to partially supersede the use of the strong spirits has proved a decided advantage.

There are no civilized races and but few uncivilized or semicivilized people, with the exception of the Mohammedans, the northern Eskimos, and the very lowest types of man—Australian and many Polynesian savages—who do not practice the distillation of alcohol in some form or other from the materials most available.

There are a number of diseases in which the temporary use of alcohol is of positive service, and there are a number of cases in which it becomes a necessity in order to prolong life.

In many cases of malnutrition and malassimilation of food, alcohol is itself a food, and its consumption under proper direction results in an increase of body weight and strength and improvement of functional activity. These results are accomplished in part through the action of alcohol as a definite food, and in part through its remarkable effect in force production. The latter is due to its own direct combustion, by which in chronic diseases and in critical acute and exhausting affections it spares the tissues of the body.

Alcohol is a most helpful food and stimulant in emergencies when other food can not be had or when the body is temporarily endangered from acute disease and the higher rate of combustion in fever or from failure to assimilate other nourishment. To offset the numerous cases of fatal alcoholism and the still larger number of cases of disease which would not presumably be fatal without the existing condition of chronic alcoholic poisoning of the system are very many cases among both infants and adults in which life is undoubtedly saved by the prompt resort to this food and stimulant and its energetic use. So long as man is exposed to hardships and conditions arising from improper and deficient food supply, as well as to the numerous infectious diseases to which he is heir, alcohol must still be regarded rather as a blessing than a curse, for there is no form of food and stimulant combined or stimulant alone which, taken all in all, can be so completely relied upon in cases of emergency.

Alcohol when taken alone will prolong life beyond the period at which it would terminate from starvation.

Whatever controversy still exists over the physiological effect of alcohol as a food, it is still undeniable that in some cases of disease it is clinically indispensable.

Alcohol in some persons, though not in all, is a very strong diuretic. In many, beer possesses a diuretic action which indicates a special stimulating effect upon the total quantity of urine excreted beyond that produced by a similar bulk of water.

Very moderate doses of alcohol increase the flow of the gastric juice and for this reason it may be employed with advantage in cases such as the following:

1. By those whose nervous system is readily overtaxed and who when fatigued or worried lose all appetite.
2. By persons of sedentary habits who have greatly enfeebled digestions.
3. In protracted convalescence from severe forms of acute disease.

The value of alcohol in the treatment of fevers is now universally recognized.

Alcohol can undoubtedly be given the first place among the cardiac stimulants.

When needed as a tonic, alcohol should be given either immediately before or in connection with meals.

When porter, ale, or stout do not derange the stomach, they may be advantageously used by those who suffer from exhausting discharges or by women weakened by prolonged suckling.

If there is no tendency to flatulent dyspepsia, beer may sometimes be used with advantage in fever cases when it will slake the thirst which is not quenched by other drinks.

The sugar of beer is fattening and the bitter matter is more or less of a stomachic tonic.

Hops extracts possess a narcotic influence, and hence beer may give rise to drowsiness.

The stronger malt liquors, such as porter and stout and heavy ales, are nutritive and fattening.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the address of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], who recently returned from France, with very great interest, and at sometime later during the session I hope to give the House some impressions which I gained from my recent visit to Europe. There is one thing, however, which I wish to say at this time. I am in hearty agreement with the gentleman from Nebraska in his prediction that this war is going to end within something like fifteen months from this date. The morale of the allies is excellent in every one of the allied countries, not only with the soldiers who are fighting, but with the people who are back of them, in Italy, France, Great Britain, and, of course, in our own country. Throughout this war the people of France have received the news, both good and bad, and no matter how dark the situation became, no matter how bad the news was, the people in France always had it. The people in Germany have been prevented from getting the truth as to this war, and have been lied to in season and out of season. So when the victories come to the allies, which are certain to come during the next few months, it is my judgment that the morale of the people in Germany, in the army and back of the army, will not stand up as did that of the people in France and the other allied countries. And speaking of news, good and unfavorable, the American newspapers give by all odds the most thorough and complete war news of any papers in the world. Those who have a kick in this respect should read the Paris and London papers.

Mr. Chairman, the problems of this war have been and will continue to be difficult of solution, but these problems do not compare in complexity with the problems which we must face after the war is over. One such problem has been in large part anticipated; the future of our disabled soldiers and sailors.

The war is no longer a new thing with our allies. The problem was presented to them long ago of an increasing number of soldiers and sailors who could not return to the fighting forces from the hospitals, and who without assistance could not face the problems of civil life. Recently a number of Congressmen visited Europe, consisting of Mr. TILLMAN, of Arkansas; Mr. THOMPSON, of Oklahoma; Mr. KELLY, of Pennsylvania; Mr. CRAMTON, of Michigan; Mr. KINCHELOE, of Kentucky; Mr. SWEET, of Iowa; Mr. DOWELL, of Iowa; Mr. ELSTON, of California; Mr. CARAWAY, of Arkansas; Mr. CHANDLER, of Oklahoma; and myself. I am pleased to see that some of these gentlemen are honoring me with their presence to-day. We had been reading of the work done among the disabled soldiers and sailors in England, and so when we reached London our first request was that we be given an opportunity to see what had been done along those lines in Great Britain. We had the privilege of visiting Queen Mary's Workshops at the Pavilion Military Hospital, Brighton, for soldiers and sailors who had lost their limbs in the war. Nothing which we saw during our entire trip was so fascinating. Here we saw many men who had been given new hope. They had come from the battle fields to the hospitals and from there back to England, many of them haunted with the fear that they could never be self-sustaining, and that in the future they would of necessity be dependent upon the bounty of others. To self-respecting men accustomed to self-reliance this is a horrible thing to contemplate. So our interest was keen in observing what had been done to help men of this class. We saw men who had completed the training for or were then in training as basket makers, carpenters, cabinetmakers, clerical workers, electrical workers, engineers, light leather work, metal turning and fitting, motor mechanism, and driving. It was an inspiration to notice how happy and full of hope all these disabled men were at this hospital as well as at the Queen Mary's Convalescent Auxiliary Hospital at Roehampton. I was not able to obtain recent figures, but during the first 18 months that the British hospitals were in operation, ending March 1, 1917, the ones who had been treated and trained in these two hospitals and who had actually found profitable positions in Great Britain were 2,037 men returned to their former positions, 1,294 placed directly in good positions, and 1,783 in positions secured by local employment committees. The work there has, of course, been tremendously enlarged since then.

Our department officials were quick to anticipate what will be needed in the care of our disabled soldiers and sailors, and the first decision which they reached, and I think very wisely, was that this work should be done by the Government and paid for entirely by appropriations made by Congress. In Great Britain the work has been carried on in large part by voluntary subscriptions.

When I was a boy attending the university at Minneapolis I recall that one of the church societies there decided to build a new church and employed one of the leading architects of that day to prepare the plans. Before undertaking the task the architect thought he should take a circle around some of the American cities for the purpose of getting some new ideas. With this purpose in view he called on a noted architect of New York City, who being told of the purpose of his visit, and not knowing the residence of his caller, said, "I would advise you to go to Minneapolis and see the First Baptist Church," to which his caller replied, "Well, that won't help me much; I drew the plans for that church myself." I do not refer to this incident to indicate that I have personally done anything toward the solution of this great problem, but to show that we may often go long distances to learn things which we might better learn at our very own doors.

Upon our return here I concluded to see at once what had been done in our own country in respect to the rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. First of all I called at the Surgeon General's office, where I found that educational work was being carried on for the mental and physical rehabilitation of disabled soldiers in 15 of the United States Army general hospitals. Surg. Gen. Gorgas first of all laid it down as a foundation principle that physical reconstruction should be defined as "complete mental and surgical treatment carried to the point of maximum functional restoration both mental and physical, and to secure this result all methods recognized by modern medicine conducive to cure should be utilized." In other words, not only the ordinary means of medicine and surgery, including all specialties, but also all physical measures which are employed under physiotherapy. He declared that modern medical treatment does not end with physical cure, and that functional restoration is the final aim of the modern physicians and surgeons. Surg. Gen. Gorgas declared that the physical rehabilitation of disabled men is peculiarly dependent upon their mental attitude, and that the educational work should begin therefore when the man has arrived at the stage when he begins to worry about his future, whether in this country or overseas. He said the first problem is to divert the man's attention by simple recreation, through reading, pictures, games, handwork, and the like, with the view to securing a genuine interest in the attaining of some worthy end, the end most certain to hold his attention and claim his best efforts in his future vocation. Hence by gradual steps he may be induced to supplement his previous vocational experience by academic, scientific, or technical instruction, or to choose a new vocation and begin preparation for it, if such a course is necessary.

Upon this broad foundation it is natural to expect that our reconstruction work in the United States will be more extended and comprehensive than the work done in Great Britain.

Mr. Chairman, one of the 15 hospitals where this work is now being carried on is easy to reach, being the Walter Reed General Hospital located right here in the District of Columbia. With the many war activities being carried on at the National Capital some have overlooked the work done at this hospital. Since my return from Europe I have visited the hospital. After talking with Col. Frank Billings, Chief of the Division of Physical Reconstruction, and Maj. A. C. Monahan at the Surgeon General's office, I started to the hospital with Maj. Monahan. On the way out the major, who is a splendid up-to-date educator, gave me a lot of information in respect to the work.

It seems that there are three classes of patients which had been kept in mind in planning the work. First, men being returned to full military service, thereby salvaging thousands for the country's fighting forces; second, men being returned to Army limited service and who have had special instruction to fit them for specialized service such as printing, shoe repairing, telegraphy, typewriting, and other work; third, men being discharged from the military service when cured and returned to civil life. Among these third-class men are a certain number so injured that they can not take hold along their previous line of work nor along any other suitable line of gainful occupation. They are "reeducation" cases, who after being cured and discharged from the Army will be given further reeducation by the Federal Board for Vocational Education as provided by a recent act of Congress. The reeducation of these men is begun while they are in the hospitals, some of them while still in bed, under the direction of the Surgeon General's office. The main aim of the work in the hospital, however, is to fit men for further military service and to provide as therapeutic measures such occupational work as will tend to facilitate and hasten their recovery. This includes functional rehabilitation for men who have lost the use of any part of the body through accident, wounds, or disease. It is from such occupational activities that the term "curative workshop" arises.

The Division of Physical Reconstruction was created in the Surgeon General's office in August, 1917. In October a subdivision of education was established. During the fall and winter months this subdivision conducted a careful survey of educational work among disabled soldiers in Canada and Europe. Reports and publications were studied and conferences were held with vocational and medical officers from several foreign countries. Also the subdivision instituted two investigations: First, of various industries in their relation to available employment possibilities for disabled men; second, of the occupations of several thousands of cripples in the United States, seeking to discover what can be done best by men with different types of disabilities.

The plans prepared for educational work in the United States military hospitals and for the further reeducation of those so injured that they would be unable to enter the occupations may be found in a Senate document entitled, "A Report of the Surgeon General of the Army on the Rehabilitation and Vocational Reeducation of Disabled Soldiers and Sailors." The scheme of the educational work in the hospitals under way follows closely those outlined in the printed document referred to.

The first actual teaching work was begun in the United States Army General Hospital at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, in February. It was followed very soon by work in Walter Reed General Hospital, Washington, D. C., and in April by work in United States Army General Hospital, Fort McPherson, Ga., and in the general hospital at Lakewood, N. J. Since then educational services have been inaugurated in United States Army General Hospitals located at Colonia, N. J.; Roland Park, Baltimore; Otisville, N. Y.; Cape May, N. J.; New Haven, Conn.; Markleton, Pa.; Waynesville, N. C., and Azalea, N. C., respectively; and at Letterman General Hospital, San Francisco, Cal.; Fort Des Moines Hospital, Iowa; and Plattsburgh Barracks Hospital, Plattsburgh, N. Y. An educational staff has been provided and is awaiting the arrival of patients at United States Army General Hospital, Carlisle, Pa. Staffs are being assembled for Fort Bayard Hospital, N. Mex., and Whipple Barracks Hospital, Ariz., and plans are under way for similar work at Fort Snelling, Minn.

Arriving at the Walter Reed Hospital, of which Col. W. F. Truby is commandant, we found Maj. B. T. Baldwin in charge of the division of reconstruction. Maj. Baldwin is a splendid type of high-class men coming to the aid of the Government during this war period. He has been professor of education at Swarthmore College, University of Chicago, University of Texas, Johns Hopkins University, and at present of the State University of Iowa, leaving a position there paying him a salary of $5,000 to accept a major's pay. A similar example is that of Dean J. E. Russell, of Columbia University. The hospital is quite a big concern, with 750 enlisted men employed in various kinds of service. Among these I was pleased to see one of the boys who served here in the House as a page, Neil King, 19 years old. He enlisted February 28, is now doing ward duty, and expects to go over to France within a few weeks, where he has three brothers in the service.

It has been interesting indeed to actually follow the wounded men, as I had the privilege to do, from the time injured on the battle field in France, where first medical aid is given, then to the emergency hospital, and back through the evacuation hospital to the base hospital, and from there across the seas to Walter Reed Hospital and other Army hospitals here in the United States. All the way through the medical service rendered by our Army surgeons is admirable. It was told us upon good authority that when Frenchmen or Englishmen happened to be wounded within reach of an American hospital they begged to be taken there. This does not mean that there has been lack of effort and attention in their own hospitals, but the American hospital arrangements are the last word in method and equipment, operated by those who are not only skillful but eager to help our wounded boys.

Upon my return to America I called at the Surgeon General's office to express my admiration and appreciation not only to the general, but to such men as Col. R. B. Miller, in charge of the personnel, who have done so much to place the medical side of the Army upon a plane never before reached in this or any other country.

The work of the Army surgeons is supplemented and very greatly aided by the American Red Cross. I see by a dispatch in this morning's Post that the Red Cross has rented some hotels along the Riviera, where wounded soldiers may rest and build up physically. That strip of country has the most delightful climate of any place on earth, outside of certain portions of our own country. The activities of the Red Cross are varied. A wonderful work is being done among the civilian population of France, which few know of here. A great work is also being done in Switzerland for our prisoners in Germany and for Russian refugees. Some day I am going to take some of your time to speak of the Red Cross. In the meantime I want to say, with the greatest emphasis, God bless the Army surgeons and nurses and the American Red Cross. [Applause.]

I can assure every mother and every father that everything that can be thought of, without regard to cost, has been provided to take care of those who are wounded in battle, or who become sick while in the service.

The treatment of those cases requiring physical or mental reconstruction begins in the hospitals in Europe. Good progress has been made in that direction, and then the work is followed out here with greater thoroughness. Both abroad and here in the United States technical training in all lines capable of adaptation to the physical limitations of disabled men and in which employment will act as a therapeutic agent will be emphasized. When play and work and study will help a man to get well, that kind of medicine will be prescribed. If the work they do leads to further service in the Army or to better prospects in civil life, so much the better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman ought to have some more time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I made a special note of some of the cases which I observed at Walter Reed Hospital. I shall call the first man case A, as Maj. Baldwin assured me it was his desire not to embarrass any of the boys by giving publicity to their cases by name. This man is 25 years old; was born in Russia; arrived at Ellis Island five years ago, not able to read or write in any language, not even his native tongue. He worked as a polisher and grinder in a shop at New Britain, Conn. He speaks English fairly well, but never learned to read or write it. He enlisted with the Ninth Infantry on July 15, 1917; went overseas and was injured in such a way that his right arm had to be amputated. He was brought to Walter Reed Hospital and enrolled with the first class in academic work. I was told that the task of learning how to write the English alphabet was very difficult for him, and also learning how to write English words with his left hand. His progress in June was slow, owing to the double problem, but his interest was maintained by carefully selected assignments in which he saw daily progress. His progress in July and August has been exceptional. Here are samples of his work, which show his present development. His interest is such that he had an attendance record of 100 per cent. He has obtained a good training in elementary spelling and arithmetic, and he goes back to society literate and confident instead of illiterate and distrustful of himself.

Case B is a young man 23 years old, known as a psychopathic case. When he began touch typewriting on June 24 he was extremely nervous and had such a tremor of the fingers that he could scarcely locate the keys. It was with great difficulty that he could keep his fingers on the "guide keys." He was directed to go very slowly and try to cultivate a steady, even touch, the teacher counting with him as in music, "1, 2, 3, 4, 5, space," and so forth. He was anxious to learn and tried to follow directions faithfully. In less than a week he was markedly improved, could locate and retain his position on the keys, and in from 10 days to 2 weeks he was writing with a steady, even touch.

He had a 30-day furlough in July and August. On his return it was noted that his nervousness had not increased and he was able to control his fingers and to do very good work. He is at present doing advanced typewriting and hopes, after the war, to go back to the same firm he was formerly with, and as they have a great deal of tabulating work, making up price lists, and so forth, he wants to be able to assist in that work.

Apart from the educational value in this case the curative value has been marked, the pupil himself having frequently commented on how the typewriting had steadied his trembling fingers.

Case C is a most interesting one, an Italian aged 32 years. The doctors pronounced his case neurasthenic hypochondria. He had had two years' schooling in Italy. When he came to the hospital he could not read English, although he had been in this country 17 years. He gave this fact as a sign or proof of his poor mentality, said he could learn fairly well but forgot everything overnight. He said that he had consulted 25 physicians in New York, who had proved his statement of the facts to be true. He showed no interest in anything; could not endure moving-picture shows, played no games, and had no hobbies nor preferred pleasures; talked much about his illness. He did not smoke and did not associate with women, lacked perseverance and self-confidence and was constantly calling attention to his physical defects and his alleged mental limitations. He was put in the academic department for English. He went one day and did little. He went the next day and stated that it was impossible for him to do anything along that line and quit. He was then assigned to the oriental rug work. The director had a good talk with him, and he has been faithful in his work there ever since, has not absented himself any time, and remains longer than the required period. His work is exceptionally good and his color selections are fine. I was greatly pleased with the samples of the work which he showed me. The director told me that he was high strung and sensitive, and that it was this sensitiveness which had wrought havoc with him. He now shows a marked change for the better and has returned to his English work, where he is doing well. He comes back after working continuously for two hours in the English work to the rug work, smiling, and leaves his rug work in the same way. It is only a matter of time, the director assured me, when instead of being dead or insane he will be well and happy, a direct economic gain.

There was another interesting case in the division where they were teaching rug making and rug repairing, which we shall call case D—a young man 25 years of age who had his right arm amputated. He was formerly a boiler maker, and, of course, could not return to that kind of work with his right arm gone. After an examination he was given an intelligence rating of E. He had had very little elementary education. The problem was to train the left arm and hand in the finer movements, particularly finger movement, and in a large way to get the left arm to become the active arm. Notwithstanding his rating and limited education he has done exceedingly well. After learning the Turkish knot he has gone ahead without assistance, following his design well and even threading his own needle. He has shown a continued, steady progress from the first, gaining each week more and more rapidly.

Case E is a college man and professor. When he arrived at the hospital his left hand was practically useless. The fingers could not be closed, and it was with great difficulty that he was able to hold even his hat. The curative process was begun by placing him on the small farm next to the hospital and requiring him to use his left hand to assist the normal right hand in very light farm operations. The work which the left hand was required to do was increased from week to week until now the left hand is able to function again with comparative ease.

Case F was particularly interesting, a man who had his right arm amputated 3 inches below the elbow. He said he expected to be a farmer, and I wondered how he could hope to do the work on a farm in his condition. When he came to the hospital he had meager schooling; he could read, but was unable to write. I asked Maj. Baldwin to give me particular details as to his case. He said they decided in his case that the curative treatment needed was, first, exercises or occupation which would require the use of his remaining hand and which would enable him to acquire dexterity with that member. Second, his dejection and pessimism on arrival at the hospital made obvious the necessity for measures to restore his confidence in himself and the future. A complete cure involved a change of the man's attitude in this respect. Third, his educational deficiencies suggested his assignment to a class where he could receive instructions in the three R's. In view of the fact that he had been unable to write with his right hand, instruction in left-hand writing constituted a double problem. At my suggestion, Maj. Baldwin handed me a written report concerning him, which reads as follows:

When this man first came to our notice he was lying in bed, gazing for long periods at one spot on the wall. He presented a picture of despair and despondency. One of the aids interested him in wood carving. Almost immediately after beginning this work his attitude changed. He was inapt in the use of his left hand, but showed rapid improvement in control as the work progressed. Thus the ward occupational work did two things for this man—it changed his attitude and it gave him muscular control.

As soon as this man was able to come to the curative workshop he was assigned to the left-hand writing class. He had no control when he began. In fact he had no knowledge of writing at all. He showed excellent spirit, was regular in his attendance, and was persistent in his efforts. This man is now able to write satisfactorily.

The patient was given instruction in the elementary branches and was enabled to make up his educational deficiency. Having considerable mechanical aptitude he was given instruction in the auto shop. His object in doing this is to fit himself to run and repair autos and tractors, which he says are being increasingly used in his community. His people own an automobile and he will now be able to make any ordinary repairs on this machine. He expects to rent a farm and utilize as much machinery as practicable to make up for his disability. His mechanical training will help him to succeed.

Mr. Chairman, what most of us must unlearn is that adults do not learn as quickly as children. The fact is they learn much faster.

Case G was a Russian. At the table beside him there was a complete carved jewel case made by him, and he was then doing some wood carving upon a large Gothic chest, really excellent work. Before the war he was a carpenter. His earning capacity will be increased over that of a carpenter by his present training. In addition to this I was told that when he sent a small, carved wooden box home his wife wrote back a letter saying they had been greatly troubled about him, picturing him as unable to do anything, restless and unhappy. His wife and children were happy in the thought that he had work to occupy him.

Some men were using foot power to run saws, and so forth, in order to restore control of joints and muscles. Some were sitting in beds learning telegraphy. Some sitting in beds pounding typewriters, and still others were engaged in other lines of work. These activities not only add to the sum of knowledge and earning power of soldiers, but create a better state of mind and hasten recovery.

There are two cases in the hospital right from my own State, both doing admirably; but as both of these cases are somewhat known to our people, I can not very well discuss them without violating the injunction of Maj. Baldwin to refrain from giving details of the condition and treatment of patients in such a way that it will become known to the patients and to their friends. I could tell of other cases equally interesting, but you gentlemen can almost go to the hospital and see for yourselves in the time it would take me to tell you about it.

Practically one-half the patients are enrolled in educational work. Some are in bedside occupations, others in ward occupations, others in daily attendance in classrooms, shops, gardens, or farms. In round numbers 300 in the United States are taking such bedside and ward occupations as woodcarving, knitting, typewriting, penmanship, reading, arithmetic, bookkeping, and so forth. Fifteen hundred are in shops taking auto repair, shoemaking, carpentry work, drafting, painting, printing, telegraphy, cabinet work, sign painting, tailoring and so forth. Five hundred are in agricultural work. Five hundred are in classroom taking elementary English and other academic subjects. Probably 300 illiterates are being taught to read and write.

Progress has been delayed for the lack of suitable buildings. Plans were made by the Division of Physical reconstruction for the erection of three special standard-type buildings at each hospital—one a school building planned to accommodate classrooms for the education of soldiers in all branches of commercial and industrial studies, such as mathematics, English, typewriting, stenography, accounting, bookkeeping, drafting; a second a physiotherapy building designed to contain rooms for all branches of therapy, including pool and large drill-room gymnastics; a third a manual curative workshop, including smith's shop, fitting shop, carpenter shop, machine shop. None of these special buildings have been completed except at United States Army hospital No. 3, Colonia, N. J. However, they are under way at several others, and in the meantime various spare space is used for educational work.

Attention has already been called to the fact that educational training goes on as an aid to surgical and medical treatment. For this bedside work, so vitally important in the initial stage of the journey toward recovery, there is immediate need, I am told, for trained women as teachers in "occupational therapy." One thousand are needed for overseas service within the next few months. Others, of course, will be needed in hospitals at home. I quote the official announcement:

> The members of this force will be called reconstruction aids. Their duties will be to teach handcrafts and other subjects to disabled soldiers in military hospitals.

Only women with unusual strength of character are desired for this service. Hard and serious work, long hours on occasion, lack of many of the luxuries and comforts of normal home life, personal and private interests subordinated to the general good, a spirit capable of cooperating with medical officers, nurses, and others in close association in common work—all these are vital. But to these general qualifications should be added knowledge and skill as teachers in the particular occupation to be taught. Attractive and forceful personality, with sympathy, tact, judgment, and industry, are supplementary qualities.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that Congress will continue to be liberal in its appropriations of money needed to restore every possible man who receives injury in our Army or Navy during this war. The work done by the Surgeon General in this direction is bound to increase in importance in proportion as our casualty lists increase. We shall, I am sure, not only give the officials engaged in this great work the money needed to carry on their activities, but our prayers will go with them for the success of their great humanitarian task. May a kind Providence watch over these returned soldiers while they remain with us on this earth, made freer and better by their sacrifices. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I judge from the size of the audience that there is not very much interest in this debate, although it has been diversified with an allopathic dose of personalities. On the 6th of June this year, about three days after the general pension bill came over from the Senate, I moved to concur in what is known as the Smoot amendment, and it was adopted and is now the law. Just previous to that time, on the 30th of May, I was turned over and badly injured in a street car accident, so I was unable to make any remarks on that occasion. This is the first opportunity I have had to compare the two bills, the one adopted by the House and the final bill agreed to by the House, with the Smoot amendment. Had I known at that time that there were so many worthy veteran soldiers who are left out entirely of all consideration by the Smoot amendment, I never would have consented to its adoption. I did not know at that time the number of soldiers who are left out of all benefits by that law. I am informed by an official of the Pension Bureau that there are 30,000 disabled soldiers, many with gunshot wounds, who will get no material benefit from this law. The House bill, which was very carefully prepared by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, provided an increase of 30 per cent for all soldiers disabled in the service or in battle, the same as those drawing on the plan of age and service, and also those pensioned by private acts. By the House bill the 90-day and 100-day soldiers were given an increase of 50 per cent. The present law gives the 100-day men an increase of 100 per cent, and the veterans who served from two to four years are only given an increase of 30 per cent. For instance, the so-called Smoot amendment gives an increase to the 100-day or the 90-day soldiers of $168 per year. It gives an increase to the veterans of four years' service, who may have been in from 30 to 40 battles, an increase of $120 a year. Furthermore, there is no provision in the Smoot amended law providing for any increase whatever for soldiers with gunshot wounds or disabled in the service. That is very unfortunate and unjust.

I received a letter yesterday—and this is one of numerous letters I have received—from Gilbert Haskins, a soldier from my district now in Pensacola, Fla., calling my attention to this rank injustice. He is now drawing a pension, as I learned, for gunshot wounds, of $24 per month. Under this law he can only draw $35 a month. Under the bill which passed the House this soldier would have been allowed $39 per month without regard to his length of service, and if his disabilities warranted would have been allowed $50 per month. In other words, the limit in the Smoot amendment is $40 per month, while the bill which passed the House provided a limit of $50 per month.

The Smoot amendment, now a law, is doing rank injustice to the men who fought through the Civil War, discriminating against them to a point of the most aggravating injustice. Many of these old veterans who are now drawing pension for gunshot wounds, and who get such a slight increase, prefer to retain their present pension, which indicates for what purpose they are drawing their pension and shows they belong to the roll-of-honor class. If they accept a slight increase under this law, they will have to surrender their pension certificate to accept another certificate which does not show on its face that they had any battle service or suffered any disability. They prefer transferring to their descendants a pension certificate which proves on its face that they belonged to the battle-scarred veterans.

I have always contended, and I contend now, that a pension should be either for disability or for service. There is no merit in being old; there is not patriotism in being old. If there were any virtue in being old, I would be the most virtuous man in this Congress, because I have been the oldest man in Congress, though not in sin, for three Congresses.

Let me illustrate the injustice of this so-called Smoot amendment. In the Atlanta campaign in 1864, after Rocky Face Mountain and Pumpkin Vine Creek, when we had reached Resaca on the 14th of May, 1864, our division that day, the second, commanded by Gen. Judah, made a charge and was defeated. It was a disastrous charge. My horse was the only horse on the battle line that was not shot. The next day Gov. Morton's boys from Indiana led the charge. Let me tell you who these boys were. They had been recruited only a short time before. Many of the regiments had never had a regimental drill. The average age of that whole brigade was less than 19 years. There were plenty of boys of 15, 16, and 17 years. Incidentally, let me say here, we did not draft boys under 20 years in the Civil War. Both Lincoln and his Secretary of War, Edward M. Stanton, during the war opposed drafting men under 20 years, but volunteers were accepted at 18 years; but no men were drafted under 20 during that whole struggle, as the record of the War Department will verify.

Let me again refer to Morton's boys, who led the charge at Resaca that memorable day, May 15, 1864. It was a successful charge, with bayonets fixed. Many were severely wounded. Again, at New Hope Church, at Kenesaw Mountain, at Nickajack Creek, and at Atlanta and Franklin and the two days' battle in front of Nashville. Those boys, if alive to-day, can get no increased pension under the Smoot amendment because they have not reached the age of 72 years.

I went into the Army at 26 years of age. I do not think there is a man alive who could stand more hardships at that time than I could. Yet the boys who went in at 15 and 16 and 17 and 18 years are older men to-day, if alive, than I am. One of our former Pension Commissioners—Mr. Dudley, of Indiana, I think it was—made an estimate about 20 years ago that the boys who went in at 16, 17, and 18 shortened their lives by 10 years, because they were not ready; they were not matured or hardened for the terrible hardships of war.

Let me repeat, because it is vital, there are 30,000 old soldiers alive to-day, the most meritorious, the most courageous, the most worthy of all that great army of heroic men who stood at the front during that four years of terrible travail and were wounded in battle, who get no consideration under this Smoot amendment except for age and service.

Let me refer here to remarks that were made in the National Tribune, a Republican organ of the Grand Army of the Republic. This journal stated that I railroaded this pension bill through the House of Representatives. I want to say—because it is a matter of record, and Col. McElroy, the editor, knew it—that I stated on the floor of the House that my committee, made up of 16 members, had unanimously instructed me as chairman to first ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the pension bill, and, if that was denied, to move to consider the bill under suspension of the rules. Yet this paper states that I railroaded the bill through the House of Representatives.

It is vital to state that the bill that the House passed would have given more adequate satisfaction to the surviving soldiers of the Civil War than the Smoot amendment.

I have compiled for the information of Members and all patriotic citizens interested a record of the pension laws passed by a Democratic House of Representatives since the Civil War, which I think will interest you. After reading this record of pension laws, it may illuminate your judgment somewhat on the question of whether the Democratic Party as a political organization has been friendly to the Union soldiers.

A short time ago my overly smart friend from Missouri [Mr. DYER] made a stirring address on this floor, giving the credit for nearly all the pension legislation since the Civil War to the Republican Party. It was this speech that induced me to prepare the following record of humane pension laws passed by a Democratic House of Representatives, of which the following are the more important:

1. Act of August 15, 1876, providing for the issuance of artificial limbs, or commutation therefor, to disabled soldiers and seamen, and providing transportation for the purpose of having the same properly fitted.

2. Act of February 28, 1877, increasing the pension of those who lost both an arm and a leg.

3. Act of March 9, 1878, granting pensions on account of service in the War of 1812 and the Revolutionary War, requiring a service of but 14 instead of 60 days on the part of the survivors of the War of 1812, and granting pensions to widows regardless of the date of marriage to soldiers of this war. It also granted pensions to widows of soldiers of the Revolutionary War on a service of 14 days. Former laws required a marriage prior to the treaty of peace in the case of widows of the War of 1812.

4. Act of June 17, 1878, increasing to $72 per month the pensions of those who lost both hands, both feet, or the sight of both eyes, incident to the service.

5. Act of March 3, 1879, increasing to $37.50 all pensions on account of amputation at the hip joint. This sum was afterwards increased to $45 per month by a Democratic House.

6. The next humane and generous pension laws were enacted January 25 and March 3, 1879, laws prepared by that gallant and enduring soldier and Congressman, Gen. Americus V. Rice, of Ohio. Gen. Rice lost his good right leg in that desperate charge on Kenesaw Mountain on June 27, 1864. This was the charge in which Gen. Harker, the poet-hero soldier, fell mortally wounded. This arrears-of-pension law, introduced and successfully piloted through a Democratic House by Gen. Rice, was at that time the most generous pension law ever enacted by any parliamentary body in the world. It gave increases to 225,000 wounded and disabled veterans, aggregating about $40,000,000. Previous to this time, as will be remembered, the Republicans had been in control of both branches of Congress for over 10 years.

7. Act of June 21, 1879, abolishing biennial medical examinations and providing that in no case shall a pension be withdrawn or reduced except upon notice to the pensioner and a hearing upon sworn testimony.

8. Act of June 16, 1880, giving $72 per month to all those who became totally helpless for any cause incident to the service.

9. Act of February 26, 1881, for the protection of pensioners in the soldiers' homes.

10. Act of July 14, 1892, establishing an intermediate rate of pensions between $30 and $72 per month and fixing the rate of $50 for all who require frequent and periodical, though not regular and constant, personal aid and attention.

11. Act of August 5, 1892, granting pensions to Army nurses and forbidding the demanding of a fee by claim agents for prosecuting this class of cases. This was a generous recognition of the noble heroines, who, leaving home and loved ones behind, in self-sacrifice braved pestilence and hardships to minister to the sick in the hospitals of the Army.

12. Act of December 21, 1893, making a pension a vested right.

Here are some other contributions to the pension laws which were either approved by a Democratic President or passed by a Democratic House of Representatives:

13. Act of March 19, 1886, from $8 to $12 per month, the pensions of 79,989 widows and dependents on the roll at the time, as well as tens of thousands who have since been placed there. These certificates were issued by a Democratic Commissioner of Pensions without any expense or unnecessary delay to those deserving beneficiaries.

14. Act of May 17, 1886, amending the reports of the War Department, which discriminated against a large and worthy class of soldiers, relieving thousands of unfortunate veterans of the hardships worked by the resting of charges against them, based upon technical errors in the records.

15. Act of August 4, 1886, increasing the pensions of 10,030 cripples—armless and legless veterans.

16. Act of January 29, 1887, benefiting about 30,000 survivors and widows of the Mexican War.

17. Act of June 7, 1888, granting arrears to widows from the date of the death of the husband and providing that all United States officials authorized to administer oaths should administer all oaths required to be made in pension cases in the execution of vouchers for pensions free of charge. This arrearage act benefited at once more than 200,000 soldiers' widows.

18. Act of August 27, 1888, increasing pensions on account of deafness.

19. Act of February 12, 1889, granting an increase in pensions from $72 to $100 per month to all persons who lost both hands in the service and line of duty.

20. Act of March 1, 1889, relating to the payment of pensions to the widows or dependent heirs where subsequent to the issuance of the check the pensioner dies.

21. Act of March 2, 1889, removing certain technical charges in the record and relieving a large and meritorious class of soldiers.

22. Act of March 2, 1895, which abolished the rates of $2 and $4 and fixed the lowest rate of pension at $6 per month.

23. The next in order is the so-called dollar-a-day pension bill that I introduced in December, 1907, and which involved a struggle in committees and on the floor of the House of Representatives of over four years—the longest enduring and most notable struggle of any pension bill ever enacted since this Republic was born. It became a law on May 11, 1912.

Let me here quote an extract from a speech I had the privilege of making on this floor February 26, 1908, when I presented those enormous petitions:

I have here seven great rolls of petitions, each 500 feet long, from soldiers who fought the battles of the war. These petitions were prepared by the old soldiers themselves in their humble homes. Some have twenty names, some have thirty, some have forty, and some have a hundred. There are only a few of these old stalwarts left in any locality. I have strung these local petitions together, and I will ask my friends to assist me in unrolling only one of them. You can see they are all headed differently and all prepared at home. Many of them are on cheap paper, written by trembling hands, in pencil. No two are alike. This, you see, is only one of seven of these great petitions. It has been unrolled and stretches up the aisle here to the back of this Hall, around the railing, and back down another aisle. On both sides of this petition are the names of the old veterans of the war, who fought the fiercest battles the world ever saw in the greatest war of all history. This petition and seven others like it bear the names of the men who enlisted under the call of Abraham Lincoln, whom we heard lauded to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dalzell]. These are the heroes who made Abraham Lincoln great, and who unified this Nation.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

At this point of my address Congressman ASHBROOK, of Ohio, arose and said:

I call attention to the fact that all but seven Members on the Republican side have left the Hall.

I did not then and do not now feel that any Republican left the floor of the House because of any remarks I was making or of any disrespect to me, but because the subject of increased pensions to veterans did not appeal to his economic sense.

24. The act of March 4, 1913, providing for automatic increase of pension under the act of May 11, 1912, on account of age and service, without further application on the part of the pensioner. This act was of very great service to soldiers.

25. The act of September 8, 1916 (section 1), providing increase of pension for a widow who was the lawful wife of an officer or enlisted man during the period of his service in the Civil War, to $20 per month, and increasing to the same rate the pension of widows of veterans of the Civil War, the Mexican War, and the War of 1812, upon their attaining the age of 70 years.

Section 2 of the same act provides restoration to the pension roll under certain conditions of widows dropped therefrom by reason of remarriage; also establishing title to original pension of certain other "remarried widows."

Section 3 of the same act extends provisions of the act of April 19, 1908, to the widows of Civil War veterans who married the soldier or sailor prior to June 27, 1905.

Records indicate that approximately 200,000 widows have benefited by the provisions of the act of September 8, 1916.

Act of April 27, 1916, medal-of-honor law, introduced and piloted through the House by Congressman SHERWOOD, giving an additional pension of $10 per month to soldiers who have been awarded a medal of honor for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty.

26. The act of March 4, 1917, providing pension of $20 per month, under certain conditions, to the survivors of certain Indian wars, and $12 per month to their widows.

27. The act of October 6, 1917 (sec. 314), increasing to $25 per month the rate of pension of widows of officers or enlisted men who served in the Civil War, the War with Spain, or the Philippine insurrection, which placed on the roll at $25 per month approximately 284,000 widows.

28. The act of June 10, 1918, providing a rate of pension ranging from a minimum of $30 to a maximum of $40 per month, depending on age and length of service; an amendment to the Sherwood dollar-a-day law of May 11, 1912.

29. The act of July 16, 1918, provides a pension at the rate of $12 per month to widows (with $2 per month additional for each child under 16 years of age) of certain veterans of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign, who married the soldier or sailor prior to the passage of the act and whose net annual income, exclusive of their own manual labor, does not exceed $250 per year; and in case of death or remarriage of the widow extending the same benefit to children under 16 years of age.

It is due here to say, and I take pleasure in saying it, that a goodly number of patriotic Republicans voted for the above enumerated pension laws passed previous to the declaration of war against the German Empire.

As a soldier of the Republic from 1861 to 1865, I am proud of the opportunity to print in enduring form this remarkable series of humane and beneficent legislation enacted by a Democratic House of Representatives.

And I am proud that our gallant young soldiers across the ocean are everywhere vindicating the hopes and prayers of a grateful people on the battle fields of France.

And it is my hope and trust that when an enduring peace is won and these heroic crusaders of democracy return to a grateful people, who glory in their achievements, they will receive more generous guardianship and humane legislation than has been accorded the veterans of 1861 to 1865.

And a further hope and prayer that they will not, like the boys of 1861 to 1865, have to wait a half century before they receive the full benefactions of a Nation's gratitude.

In a darker hour than this it was said by one of the most prescient prophets of human destiny that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church. In this greatest of all wars let us look the future in the face with courage undaunted. The blood of our crusading heroes on the gory battle fields of France will be the seed of a new and virile and all-pervading democracy. Under the serene and masterful leadership of our great President and Commander in Chief a new spirit will arise when the angel of peace greets the angel of victory. That spirit, dominating and all pervading, will be the animate genius of a realized democracy for the struggling millions of Europe. And may God speed the coming day.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has seemed to me that for the last two or three days, at least, we have been giving very little time to the consideration of this the most marvelous measure that has ever been considered by any Congress or by any body of men in the whole world.

To my mind, politics should be adjourned, as the President has said, particularly in the discussion of this measure. The people of this country are anxiously awaiting the action of this body upon this measure. In my judgment, they are not so particularly concerned with regard to the amount of taxes which we are going to impose upon them by this measure as they are concerned with regard to the expenditure of the same. The only complaint that I hear among the men with whom I associate and whom I meet is that the expenditures of the Government are not being properly checked up. No one seems to have any idea as to the amount of money that is being expended in the various war activities. It is difficult to ascertain from any department what the money is being used for, or where.

A short time ago I had the pleasure and honor of speaking for a few moments to a body of gentlemen constituting the Rotarians of the city of Utica. They are, as most of you know, a body of men each of whom represents a particular industry in the community. I made this statement to them, which I think is practically universal, and seems the sentiment of the people with regard to this tax measure: "Some three months ago, when we began to discuss the measure, I directed letters to the various chambers of commerce in my district and asked them to point out to me or to meet with me or to have me meet with them and show me the things in the present law that were not agreeable to them, or make suggestions with regard to the new one. After waiting three months I received one communication only." And I said to those men that in considering that situation I must assume that they were satisfied with what they had and would be content with what they got, which statement was met by them with a general round of applause. So I must assume here that the sentiment that prevailed there is typical of the sentiment of the country with regard to this matter.

I have made a fairly careful study of this bill, and I believe that with one or two exceptions it is about the best we could expect to get at this time. And the committee, in my judgment, is entitled to commendation not only from all the Members of this House but from the country generally.

The section that I particularly dislike is that which imposes an additional 6 per cent tax upon the undivided portion of the net profits of any corporation. It seems to me that, considering the tables which our colleague, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], showed us a day or two ago, and the very small amount of net profit that will be left to the corporation after a surtax or war tax has been deducted, the amounts remaining will be so small after normal dividends have been paid that certainly we ought not to feel it necessary that we should penalize corporations to the extent of authorizing this additional tax of 6 per cent. I believe that the average corporation in this country, like the average business man, is loyal and honest and will distribute at this time, during this period of war, the normal dividend or normal distribution of the profits, as they have heretofore. They will not attempt to escape from taxation by putting to the surplus a greater amount than they would in normal times. Therefore I am opposed to that section, and I hope that the measure may be properly amended when it comes to that point. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SEARS). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] such time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of course, I shall vote yea on the passage of this pending colossal measure. Its enactment is essential to the winning of the war, and therefore indispensable to the existence and future welfare of our Republic. But, more than that, on this bill hangs the future of the whole world, since it is to provide for the maintenance of our armies which are to sustain the allies in the advance to a final victory over the forces that would destroy liberty and all that civilization holds most sacred.

I am in most hearty accord with the policy of the administration to provide at once enough men and money for the carrying on to speedy triumph over our enemy. There is economy in quick preparation, in intensive fighting. The recent victories are attributed partly to the celerity of movement, for which American troops have received their share of just credit, heroically earned. In this war we can not fight it out too fast. Every hour's delay is to be deemed an hour of preparation or recuperation for the enemy. To sustain the present successes of the allies, which demonstrate the advantage of velocity in action that gains through uninterrupted momentum, we must have tremendous ready resources. There must be no faltering in providing them. All that is necessary must be given gladly.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill provides for the greatest expenditures of any of the war-revenue bills yet presented, and not only that, but the greatest expenditure ever granted by any legislative body in the world's history for war purposes or for any purpose whatever. The burdens it will impose upon taxpayers will be more bravely and more cheerfully borne than any hitherto carried by the people of the United States, since all have an equal interest in our armies on land and sea, all are giving their best man power to make up the millions who are to fight beneath the flag. Victory is equally the concern of all, for no family is too distinguished and none too humble to not be exalted by having one of its members a soldier in the service of our country.

The measure provides for the expenditure of $24,000,000,000 in the next fiscal year, estimated to be necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury. Coupled with this is the Secretary's recommendation that one-third of the amount, or $8,000,000,000, be raised by taxes within the next 12 months. The other two-thirds, or $16,000,000,000, is to be realized by the sale of liberty bonds. The financial responsibility which our country is assuming is very great, but it is negligible as compared with the momentous objective involved. It is not to save from Prussianism and barbarism France alone, or Great Britain alone, or America alone, or, indeed, all the allies. It is for the salvation of all mankind that we are to-day voting billions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, these taxes are to be raised.

Mr. Chairman, the bill covers 14 titles, combining in the one measure the income tax, the war-profits and excess-profits tax, the estate tax, the tax on transportation and other facilities and on insurance, the tax on beverages, the tax on cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof, the tax on admissions and dues, the excise taxes, special taxes on occupations, and the stamp taxes, provision for an advisory tax board and general administrative provisions and general provisions.

Every effort has been made to assure an equitable distribution of the burdens necessary for waging this righteous war. Certainly, at best, just division of the taxes can be only approximated. It will be inevitable that some industry or interest will be made to bear more than its share, but it is the intention that all shall make sacrifices in proportion to their possessions of property and their incomes or earning capacities. It is unlikely the bill is acceptable to a single Member of this body in every respect. Covering as it does all industries, all businesses and investments, professions, and productive labor in every form, it would be granted that to satisfy all these would be an impossible achievement.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the promptness and unanimity with which the Members of this House have been responding to the demands of the war, the great majority of them are now being criticized for not having favored war-preparedness measures when the country was pursuing a peace policy. For instance, in New York City the National Security League's congressional committee has undertaken to make ratings on the merits of the votes on alleged war measures made by Members of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses—this Congress and the last Congress.

In their way they find that of the 347 Members who sat in both of these Congresses, only 47 voted right on all of the 8 certain votes on which they criticize the membership, with the remaining 300 voting wrong on all or some of the eight questions. On the face of it the proposition carries with it the challenge that it is incorrect, else the rule of the majority, the fundamental upon which this Republic is based, is fallacious. But I am willing to let the people judge, in the light of all the circumstances, whether the criticisms are fair. Of course, my purpose is to present my own case rather than to presume to meet the criticisms made against the entire membership criticized. Besides, several of these Members have already spoken upon the question generally and with particular reference to their own votes, so fairly and so ably that nothing remains to be said that could add merit to the presentations they have made.

Mr. Chairman, I am charged with voting wrong on six of the questions specified. Let me emphasize to start with that not a single one of these six votes took place after war was declared. Five which I shall first give notice to were considered and voted upon when the administration was pursuing a peace and neutrality policy. Are votes upon peace measures, while pursuing a peace and neutrality policy, to be taken as a fair criterion for what the attitude of Members would have been had we been engaged actually in war as we now are?

Mr. Chairman, I desire also to emphasize that of the six votes which were made previous to the declaration of war, five of them were recorded previous to the presidential and congressional elections of 1916, when the President and the 347 Members of Congress criticized were reelected. It is noteworthy, in view of the criticisms now being made, that these Members of Congress were reelected without being opposed or criticized by their constituents or criticized or arraigned by the candidates running against them for their votes now under criticism. So long as there was no war not enough objection had been found to the votes now complained of to create any noticeable opposition to the continuance of the particular Members in their seats. Now the situation has changed from peace to actual war in which we are engaged. The criticisms are being presented from the viewpoint of actual war, when the votes were made purposely in accordance with the peace and neutrality policy at that time being pursued.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to note that these 300 Members, classed as wrong, are included in the body to which at the close of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, after the most of the record complained of had been made, the President and the Speaker of the House paid eloquent tributes. The President said:

PRESIDENT WILSON'S STATEMENT.

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose I believe it has faithfully expressed. One can not examine the record of its action without being impressed by its completeness, its courage, and its full comprehension of a great task. The needs of the Army and the Navy have been met in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms, and the war-making branch of the Government has been abundantly equipped with the powers that were necessary to make the action of the Nation effective.

I believe that it has also in equal degree, and as far as possible in the face of war, safeguarded the rights of the people and kept in mind the consideration of social justice, so often obscured in the hasty readjustments of such a crisis.

It seems to me that the work of this remarkable session has not only been done thoroughly, but that it has also been done with the utmost dispatch possible in the circumstances or consistent with a full consideration of the exceedingly critical matters dealt with. Best of all, it has left no doubt as to the spirit and determination of the country, but has affirmed them as loyally and as emphatically as our fine soldiers will affirm them on the firing line.

SPEAKER CLARK'S STATEMENT TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I congratulate you on the ending of the most important session of Congress in the history of the Republic. The amount of business that we have transacted is absolutely amazing and stupendous. I think every Member of this House has contributed all that was in him to the support of the Government of the United States in this great emergency. So far as I have been able to observe—and I have observed very closely—partisan politics have been temporarily banished from this House.

I think every man has given the utmost of patriotism to his service here. I doubt very much whether any other Congress from now until the day of judgment will ever vote as much money in one session as we have voted; I hope not. Every dollar that the departments have asked, or the President has made it appear they needed, they have got, and the Sixty-fifth Congress has deserved well of the country.

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, six of the criticized votes were made before we entered the war, at a time when we were still pursuing a neutrality and peace policy. For a Member to have stood positively for war at that time would have been to place himself in opposition to the administration. I want to call attention now to the fact that both before and after the United States had entered the war I voted for all preparedness measures asked for by the War and Navy Departments. Since April 6, 1917, when war was declared I have supported every war measure. Although at 4 o'clock on that morning of April 5 I voted against the declaration of war, I announced by letters and telegrams, sent out three hours later to my constituents, that I deemed it my duty as a Member of Congress to stand for the speedy and vigorous prosecution of the war until victory was achieved. Every word uttered and every vote I have since recorded has been in fulfillment of this pledge.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take up the specific criticisms in the order in which they are named.

No. 1 is the McLemore resolution, which advised American citizens to avoid traveling upon armed merchant ships of belligerent nations carrying arms and munitions. Let it be understood I did not vote for the McLemore resolution and had no intention of voting for it in any event. I was opposed to it. I should state further that I had been much pleased when the Foreign Relations Committee unanimously voted to table the resolution, with the intent that it be finally disposed of, and it was the understanding that this was the end of the resolution. Finally, however, the President found reason for asking that the resolution be revived, and accordingly the Congress was asked to take it up and vote upon it on its merits. In compliance with this request the bill was revived by the Committee on Foreign Relations and reported to the House of Representatives for its consideration. When the resolution came up on the floor of the House a motion was made to table it, and the vote being taken thereon, there were—yeas 275, nays 136. I voted against the motion to table because defeat of it would offer the only means whereby a substitute could be offered, and I had joined a number of others in the support of a substitute, which, while recognizing our rights upon the seas, advised American citizens not to avail themselves of the right to travel upon the armed vessels of belligerent nations carrying munitions of war without their business interests made it imperative to do so.

Criticism No. 2 refers to the Kahn amendment to the Hay Army bill, considered March, 1916, more than a year before war was declared. This amendment proposed to raise the Regular Army from 140,000 to 220,000 men. The vote was—yeas 186, nays 211. I voted against the amendment with the majority and in accordance with the recommendation of the Military Affairs Committee, backed by the Secretary of War. In the discussions had it was disclosed that the War Department officials had advised that it would be wholly impracticable to increase the standing Army by the volunteer system to the extent proposed, in view of the fact that ever since 1891, while a maximum of 100,000 men had been authorized by law, the fact was 87,000 had been the largest number which could be realized. Let me quote here a distinguished Democrat, a firm supporter of the administration, the language he used when discussing his vote expressed against this identical amendment, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. He said:

> Neither the President nor the Secretary of War had asked for such an increase in the Regular Army, and at the time a vote for the Kahn amendment was considered to be an antiadministration vote.

Criticism No. 3 refers to the Brandegee amendment to the Hay-Chamberlain Army bill to increase the number of men to 250,000 as against 140,000. This amendment pertains to the same bill to which the Kahn amendment was made and the same reasons for proposing the second amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut applies to what have been assigned for voting against the House amendment. As evidence that the Hay-Chamberlain bill was not a war-preparation, manpower measure, but meant only to provide for a standing Army for peace times, I quote briefly from the language used by the able chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Virginia, Mr Hay, when making earnest opposition to this very amendment. Mr. Hay said:

> Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has so far been able to keep this country out of war; and, looking to what is now taking place in Europe, we may expect that the country will still be kept out of war. * * *

Mr. Hay continued:

> We may rest assured that this country, having preserved the peace thus long during this great crises in the world's history, has the respect of the world, and that we will have no war to meet, and therefore that it is unnecessary to place upon the citizens of this country for all time the burden of a standing Army of 250,000 men.

It was only a few months after the discussions referred to that the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Hay, was, by the President, nominated a judge of the Court of Claims, a life position with a good salary. His nomination was confirmed.

Criticism No. 4 refers to a Senate amendment to the Hay Army bill known as section 56, for an Army exclusively Federal to be raised by taking 600 men from each congressional district. This amendment was regarded as being in opposition to the existing National Guard. I received protests against it from officers and men in the Nebraska National Guard. I received strong protests against it from constituents who were in sympathy with the National Guard. It was understood that in reality it meant the adoption of a continental army scheme, though in a slightly different form. It will be recalled that Mr. Garrison, Secretary of War, had previously resigned because the President would not with him oppose the National Guard and favor the continental plan to which the Secretary was devoted. I voted with the committee having the bill in charge and with the very large majority against the amendment and this was in accord with the attitude of the administration on the question.

Criticism No. 5 is made concerning votes recorded against the amendment to instruct an increase in the Navy board, as provided by the bill then under consideration, June 22, 1916. However, as I voted for this amendment I am credited with having voted right in behalf of a preparation measure, but it hardly deserved to be classed a war measure.

Criticism No. 6 refers to the Cooper amendment made to the armed-neutrality measure, for which I and all other Nebraska House Members voted March 1, 1917, yet before war was declared. The New York committee states this amendment was designed to prevent American ships from exercising their legal right to carry arms or munitions with their cargoes.

However, the amendment was formed along the lines of the advice given by the best authorities available on international and maritime law as to what the legal rights of a nation were under the situation the legislation was intended to meet. We viewed the law as it is now understood to be. But in voting for the amendment I was governed very largely—and I am sure many others were so impelled—to vote for it on the humane feature of preserving the lives of defenseless citizens of a neutral nation.

This position was in complete accord with the notable state paper written by the distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, in the form of a letter to the British ambassador, in which it stated that consideration be given—

> Primarily the humane purpose of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon a doubtful legal right which may be denied on account of new conditions.

Of course, this armed-neutrality bill was a distinctly defensive measure. The President said when recommending it:

> I am not now proposing or contemplating war or any steps that need lead to it.

Mr. Chairman, I have now given attention to all the votes with which I am criticized. Let me emphasize again, I am not criticized for a single vote made after the war declaration was passed. Of real war measures, including House and Senate bills, joint resolutions of the two Houses, and the large number of riders placed upon appropriation bills, there have been near 300 disposed of, with several votes recorded upon many of them.

Mr. Chairman, although the Sixty-fifth Congress since the beginning of the war has passed approximately 300 measures relating to war preparations, has appropriated amounts of money vaster than any other nation has ever dared to contemplate, although it has authorized expenditures counted by billions and has unfalteringly sustained the administration in policies so far-reaching in their courageous enterprise that the United States has been able to perform almost miracles in raising, equipping, and transporting armies and building ships and finally in winning battles and supporting our allies, this committee selects eight questions voted on, six of which were voted upon previous to the war declaration, to show the attitude of the Members toward war preparation. The committee pronounced only 47 of the 347 Members voted right on all the eight questions. But it must have been due to the votes of these 300 Members that nearly 300 bills for the prosecution of the war were passed, for certainly the 300 Members comprise a large majority.

Mr. Chairman, is not the record made since the declaration of war by the 300 Members who have been criticized the best evidence that they have been standing firmly for the victory of the allies? The circumstance that the criticisms stop with April 23, 1917, ought to be conclusive of the question. Let me ask, How could the Congress have actually prepared for the war before war had been actually resolved upon, and who could have done more than these 300 Members have done for war preparations since the declaration was passed? The record shows they have uniformly and loyally supported the administration in every step toward a righteous victory which is to restore peace to the whole world.

Mr. Chairman, directing my remarks again to the provisions of the pending bill, the greatest sacrifice is justified; it is imperative. The flower of our American manhood is giving life on the battle field. The boys that we have sent overseas to defend the sacred ideals of liberty are performing feats of incredible bravery that uphold the traditions of our Republic. They are bearing toward Germany the flag that symbolizes freedom; they are helping to liberate the victims of Prussianism. Inspired by the principles on which this Nation has built so nobly, so successfully, that it has the power now to aid in delivering Europe—and, indeed, the whole world—from the danger of a return to a condition worse than barbarism, they are each day fighting with a superb valor. Singing as they march forth to battle in the splendor of their youth and strength, these representatives of the Nation are giving such a good account of themselves and of their country that henceforth there must be a new understanding of the meaning of democracy. Firm in the faith that right will win, that right must prevail so that humanity shall not again fall into the night, they carry on the light of liberty. Wendell Phillips said, "Right is the eternal sun and all the world can not hold it back," for as a poet sang:

Right is right, as God is God,
And right the day shall win,
To doubt would be disloyal;
To falter would be sin.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, among the various duties and responsibilities of a representative of the people the least pleasing, the most thankless, is that of laying taxes upon the people he represents, for taxes are never popular, as is testified by the proverbial linking of death and taxes as the two unavoidable misfortunes.

If the laying of tax burdens is a disagreeable duty in ordinary times, when the burdens laid are comparatively light, at least normal, how much more unpleasant the duty becomes when taxes must be laid in the unprecedented fashion which becomes necessary in order to produce the enormous, almost incomprehensible sums required in the prosecution of the great enterprise of war in which we are engaged.

What I have just said applies without variation or modification to ordinary times and conditions, but nothing demonstrates more clearly that we are not living under ordinary conditions but under conditions of ready and cheerful and willing sacrifice than the fact that this enormous tax bill, levying tax burdens higher than we have as a people heretofore dreamed of, calculated to raise a sum larger than any nation on earth has ever raised by taxation, should be received and accepted by the people with less of protest and more of cheerful acquiescence than any revenue law or tax measure I can recall.

I do not pretend to say the people are enthusiastic over the project of paying $8,000,000,000 to the support of the Government in a single year, a sum great enough to have more than paid the cost of the entire Civil War on both sides. But it is a wonderful tribute to the patriotism, the steadfastness, the grim determination of the American people to win that we have heard so little criticism of the plan and purpose of making the enormous tax levies that are proposed.

This cheerful acceptance by the American people of enormous tax burdens is the final and conclusive evidence, should any such evidence be considered necessary, of the united will of our people to make the winning of the war their one primary object and purpose, their one essential business. Other evidences of this we have had in plenty, but going down into one's jeans and into every pocket to pay heavily and to accept the process cheerfully may be accepted as conclusive proof that all the people are proposing to see this thing through as speedily as possible, but certainly and beyond peradventure to a completely decisive and victorious conclusion.

LAY THE BURDEN EQUITABLY.

All the people have asked, all they will ask, is that the necessary burden shall be laid fairly and equitably. The burden falls, as it should, principally on large incomes, excessive profits, and luxuries. I am sure we would all be greatly relieved when we give our final approval to this stupendous measure if we felt entirely confident that every feature of it was entirely equitable, and as applied to everyone's contributions entirely clear, definite, and understandable.

I am sure that is what the committee has tried to make it, but I fear that when the business man comes to make out his schedule he will find we have not entirely cleared up some of the confessed confusions of the present law. I say this without intending criticism of anyone, for I know of no more difficult problem in legislation than that of laying great tax burdens in a way to reach every situation and condition, of the unwilling as well as the willing, and at the same time avoid ambiguities, inequalities, even downright injustice as applied to some cases and conditions.

I do not claim to be enough of a revenue expert to suggest material modifications of the work of real experts on this bill. I do think, however, that amendments should be made that will give relief to what may properly be termed hazardous enterprises. The range, cattle, and sheep business are, to an extent that is little appreciated, enterprises of this character. The oil business can well be classed as extra hazardous, involving extraordinary risks and the possibility of occasionally large returns. These classes of enterprises should have special consideration. As affecting enterprises of this character and business in general the bill should be modified so as to be more equitable as between corporations organized and capitalized prior to the war and those recently organized. This latter class of corporations, under the so-called war-profits tax, would be called upon to pay a much heavier tax than prewar corporations engaged in exactly the same line of business. During the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule I shall offer or support amendments intended to cure these defects of the bill.

The Republican minority has perhaps had more to do with arranging the details of this revenue measure than any minority in years, and I am of the opinion that it is due to the minority influence, in part at least, that, considering the enormous sum to be raised, the bill is relatively free from vexatious forms of taxes which burden and annoy without producing revenue in proportion. And yet the general plan and scope is, of course, that of the majority. The President suggested, the Secretary of the Treasury advised, and the chairman of the committee guided as to the sum and general substance of the measure. I am not prepared to say how much different the bill might have been under Republican guidance. My belief is that it would have thrown a portion of the burdens on the foreigners who are seeking admission to our markets.

WHY NOT INCREASE CUSTOMS DUTIES?

The last fiscal year witnessed the greatest volume of imports in our history—three billions and over. On this enormous volume of trade, much of which was produced abroad at prewar costs and sold here at war prices, the foreign producer paid less than $180,000,000 in customs, about 6 per cent. My opinion is that we coul raise upward of $300,000,000 more at the customhouse without appreciably raising the price of any imported article. Under present conditions the foreigner would most certainly pay the tax. It looks now as though prohibition legislation would largely curtail the estimated income under this bill. A reasonable tariff tax is the one opportunity of providing for that loss without laying additional direct burdens.

Under the tariff policy we are now pursuing we have become the one and only great free-trade Nation. So-called free-trade England collected import duties last year amounting to over $8 for each of her citizens. The current year England will collect customs duties amounting to over $10 per capita. We will collect from customs less than $1.75 per capita. If we were to collect this year at our customhouses from foreign imports the rate per capita that so-called free-trade England collects, it would amount to over a billion dollars. I would not suggest tariff levies as heavy as those of England, but clearly we could lighten the burden of our direct taxes hundred of millions by fair tariff rates.

We have just enrolled an additional 14,000,000 of our men and boys for service, and coincident with this enrollment comes the first distinctively American offensive on the western front, and gloriously successful it was! We are reaching the condition where we can apply the full of American man power to the contest, and in this legislation we are marshaling the Nation's money power. The combination will be irresistible. Out of this combination of stout hearts and sturdy limbs and an abundant war chest, with the heart and soul of America in the contest, shall come victory for justice and the right.

THE DEMAND FOR HONESTY AND ECONOMY IN EXPENDITURE.

Twenty-four billion dollars is the lowest estimate of our expenditures for the present fiscal year. There will remain, therefore, approximately sixteen billions to be raised by the sale of bonds and certificates in addition to the enormous sums raised by taxation. Appalling as these expenditures are, the people are prepared to provide the funds, but they have the right to insist that they shall be honestly and economically expended.

Government expenditures in time of war, and particularly in the case of so gigantic a war, can not in the nature of things be wholly free from extravagance or entirely safeguarded from dishonesty, and no good purpose is served by unnecessarily magnifying or emphasizing isolated and more or less inevitable wastes and losses of these characters. When, however, policies are pursued which invite extravagance, encourage waste, and tend to promote dishonesty it becomes the duty of the Congress, which lays the burdens and makes the appropriations, to call attention to and attempt to correct these evils.

The Senate committee, which investigated aircraft production under the original six hundred and forty million appropriation made for that purpose, rendered a distinct service in calling attention to and checking the reckless, wasteful, incompetent, if not dishonest, management under which a large portion of that vast sum was worse than wasted, leaving us 15 months after our declaration of war without a single fighting or bombing plane of American manufacture in action on the western front. Members of Congress returned from the battle lines speak feelingly of the losses inflicted on our troops over there by enemy airplanes, inadequately opposed, delivering deadly machine-gun fire at close range on our gallant advancing forces.

Those who have called attention to the extravagances in the building of cantonments, munitions, and shipbuilding plants under the cost-plus system have performed a most valuable service in the checking of these lootings and extravagances by compelling a modification in later contracts and a closer supervision and scrutiny of those already made. In the meantime, however, needless and unjustifiable expenditure has run into enormous sums. Fortunately some, at least, of these questionably gotten gains will be returned to the Treasury through the income and excess-profits taxes carried in this bill.

THE NATION UNITED IN SUPPORT OF THE WAR.

At any other time in our history than the present the faults and failures of plans and programs, the enormous, worse than useless expenditures to which I have referred, would have been emphasized and exploited through the partisan press without stint and limit, as was done in the Civil War and more recently in the War with Spain, for, as Col. Harvey recently said, "The scandal of the airplane program alone casts into the shade all of the actual and alleged faults and derelictions of the Spanish War." I am glad to be able to say that these regrettable occurrences have been generally discussed only with the thought and purpose of curing and preventing a repetition of them.

Why this happy difference in conditions? It is, in my opinion, due very largely to the fact that for the first time in our history there is no partisan or party opposition, covert or open, to the prosecution of the war; that for the first time in our history the principal minority party is not only not indulging in wanton criticism, inventing and promoting obstacles, but is actually doing quite as much, and its friends believe even more, than the party in power in patriotically, actively, and forcefully exerting the tremendous strength of its mighty influence in the support of the administration and the country in carrying the war to a successful issue.

PARTISAN OPPOSITION IN OTHER WARS.

During the War for Independence we had our Tories who believed in the divine right of kings and opposed the aspirations of our people. When in 1812 we sought to assert our sovereign rights on land and sea as an independent people the then minority party, or at least a large number of its leaders, opposed the declaration of war and so continuously hampered its prosecution as to bring it to a premature and inconclusive close. In 1846 the Democrats, then in power, met the bitter opposition of the Whigs to the undertaking and the prosecution of the War with Mexico.

The story of partisan opposition to President Lincoln and to the prosecution of the Civil War in the Northern States is so recent and the story so distressing that one hesitates to go into it at length or in detail. That partisan opposition wrung from the agonized heart of the immortal Lincoln the cry that the enemy at home gave greater anxiety and aroused more fears relative to a successful outcome than the armed and intrepid enemy at the front.

This partisan opposition expressed itself not only in the crimes and vandalism of secret organization and covert partisan intrigue but it was openly and defiantly expressed in national and local political platforms. In the darkest hours of the Civil War, when the very existence of the Nation was in supreme peril, our brave men battling on countless fields and the country bleeding at every pore the minority party in conventions, national and local, assailed the administration in unmeasured terms, declared the war a failure, insisted on a cessation of hostilities, and denounced as a usurper and a tyrant the great and patient President.

The story of the Spanish War is still fresh in the memory of us all. While well nigh universal sentiment approved its undertaking, its progress was marked with intense, bitter, and continuous partisan criticism. Of the minority party in the House all but an immortal five refused support to the revenue measure essential to the support of the Government in the conduct of the war.

THE LOYAL STAND OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

I make these references simply to emphasize the happy contrast between those conditions and the conditions of to-day, when the attitude of the Republican Party has been so aptly stated by the chairman of its national committee, Will H. Hays, as follows:

> Let me emphasize what our first purpose signifies. It means, primarily, that at this moment, the greatest of all crises in our history, when the Republican Party finds the control of the Government in other hands, it still sinks deeper into the soul of the Nation in becoming the dominant war party, pledging ourselves to give the last of our blood and our treasure, if necessary, to win the war and to win it now. We pledge ourselves forever against an inconclusive peace, and at every moment of faltering on the part of those in power we instantly pick up the guerdon of battle and cry, "Carry on."

This is a government of parties. The national life is largely influenced by the attitude of parties and of party leaders and representatives. And the fact of the unity of national sentiment back of the administration and the Government in the prosecution of the war is largely due to the unfailing loyalty of attitude of Republicans in public and private life the country over. Their attitude left no place of refuge or comfort for those who were indifferent or disloyal to the country's cause.

POLITICS ARE ADJOURNED.

In view of the attitude of unfailing support on the part of Republicans it is not strange that the President should have rather belatedly suggested that "politics are adjourned." Politics had been adjourned so far as any attempt on the part of Republicans to use the war issues for partisan purposes from the very beginning of the struggle, and have continued so to this day and will continue adjourned until our victorious forces shall bring peace through victory. We shall not suspend or abate our proper political activity, certainly the President did not intend or expect his party should do so, but our activity shall not involve the use of war issues to promote party interests.

I wish I were entirely certain that our friends of the opposition would follow the same course of divorcing their political activities from war issues; from efforts to use the war as a means, not of promoting democracy but of promoting the interests of the Democratic Party.

Our Democratic friends can not successfully claim they have not used war issues in the past for partisan purposes. The people are not likely to soon forget the slogan, "He kept us out of war," which constituted the principal appeal on behalf of their candidate in the last presidential election. Near the close of that historic campaign of 1916 the Democratic candidate for the Vice Presidency in a public address stated that every man who voted for Mr. Hughes should at once go to the nearest recruiting station and enlist, for Hughes's election meant war. And, by the way, this same gentleman a few weeks ago, in a campaign speech in Indiana, said, "This war is a Democratic asset."

Some may have forgotten the famous Shadow Lawn speech delivered by President Wilson October 21, 1916, just a few days before the last election.

> I am not expecting this country to get into war, I know that the way in which we have preserved peace is objected to, and that certain gentlemen say that they would have taken another way that would inevitably have resulted in war, but I am not expecting this country to get into war, partly because I am not expecting those gentlemen to have a chance to make a mess of it.

But we did get into war, on the President's advice, just 32 days after the beginning of his new term of office. And we got into war not because one man, rather, than another was elected President, but because conditions arose under which our getting into war was inevitable.

THE WAR AS A PARTY ASSET.

"This war is a Democratic asset," said Vice President Marshall to his Democratic friends in Indiana. That was evidently what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], the chairman of the Democratic congressional committee, had in mind when he delivered a speech here a few days ago, assuming great credit for his party on account of the war. He made at least one profound mistake. That was in his somewhat covert and indirect attempt to prove that the Democratic Party had been strong for preparedness prior to the war. Unfortunately for the gentleman, his argument is not based on the facts of the records, as was conclusively shown the other day by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Those of us who have during all our service tried to be logical and consistent in the maintenance of a reasonable and highly efficient Naval and Military Establishment, who have neither voted with the little Army and Navy men nor always with those who were seeking extraordinary increases, recall that since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary a considerable majority, generally a large majority, of the Democrats have been for the smallest program proposed by anyone. That was the record for years.

PREPAREDNESS.

It is not extraordinary that the year before the war, in connection with the appropriation bills considered during the spring and early summer of 1916, the Democratic Party should have been opposed to the Army and Navy increases which were advocated by many Republicans and proposed in various amendments and motions to recommit. Had not the President said something about being "too proud to fight"? Had he not at just about that time said that "with the causes and objects of the European war we are not concerned"? Did he not even later, in October, as I have stated, say that he was not expecting war? In that condition of affairs, and with that view and expectation, the President's party very naturally was not favorable to as large increases in the Military Establishment as many of the Republicans favored.

I can not quarrel with the President and his party relative to those matters, because on the four votes in the summer of 1916 proposing increases of the Army and Navy above what was indorsed and approved by the administration I voted with the Democratic majority rather than with the majority of my own party. Curiously enough, a certain so-called league which approved these four antiadministration votes for increases and condemns those who did not vote that way is being approved by some Democrats and some Democratic papers.

If our Democratic friends do not want to suffer endless embarrassment they will not pursue this preparedness lead. Their record is against them. Even my genial friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma, the chairman of the Democratic congressional committee, voted no on the Kahn, the Brandegee, and the section 56 amendments for increases on the Army bill in March, May, and June, 1916, and on the Browning motion to recommit the Navy bill June 2, 1916, providing for naval increases. And that is not strange; most of his party voted that way as good administration men. In those cases I voted with them.

The fact is that whatever party credit there is for a preparedness program before our entry into the war, it is due to the Republican Party. Every proposal for increases came from Republicans and were largely supported by Republican votes, as was also clearly shown by the gentleman from Iowa in his speech day before yesterday. I do not recall any considerable support from the Democratic side for increases in rifles, machine guns, field artillery, submarines, and destroyers, which we have proposed at various times.

DEMOCRATIC PROTESTS AGAINST PARTY FOLLY.

I do not wonder at the protests we have heard from the Democratic side against the fool action of some Democratic committees and politicians in attempting to use the 8-barreled Security League "blunderbus" in an attempt to discredit Republican Congressmen. The old story of the sad fate of the raw recruit who put eight charges in the single barrel of his smooth-bore musket and rammed them all down before he fired is the only historical parallel. "Here lies a fool who should have known it was overloaded," was, as I recall, his epitaph. If this criticism of Congress were worthy of serious consideration it would constitute an awful indictment against the Democratic membership in Congress; for out of the 214 Members on the Democratic side in the present Congress the league gives a clean bill of health to only 5, none of whom reside west of the Alleghanies or south of Mason and Dixons line. About nine-tenths of the Democratic membership of this body, including all of the leaders and chairmen of important committees, are from five-eighths to seven-eighths to the bad according to the league.

This tough record of you gentlemen on the Democratic side from the standpoint of this self-constituted censor of congressional virtue is not to be wondered at when we remember that of the eight so-called test votes which the league adopts out of the hundreds of important votes that have been cast in Congress in the last two and one-half years, four of the votes approved by the league were clearly, definitely, distinctly, and universally recognized as antiadministration votes. They are the four votes I heretofore referred to, supporting proposed increases in the Army and Navy in 1916 above what was approved by the War and Navy Departments and the administration at the time. Perhaps I should apologize to the league for having voted on these four occasions with the administration and the Democratic majority. Except for those four administration votes I should personally be six-eighths perfect according to the league.

Of course, Democratic committees are not using this league stuff in districts where Democratic Members of the present House are candidates, except perhaps in the case of the five lone Democrats down in Yankeedom which the league indorses. They fondly imagine they can utilize this bell-muzzled blunderbus as the historic old rifleman tried to train his flintlock so that it would hit what it was aimed at if the object happened to be a deer and miss it if it was a stray calf. The trouble with that sort of political chicanery and demagogery is that the people read and understand and the old game which some have no doubt successfully played in the past of blowing hot and cold at the same time no longer works. The "bellerings" in one congressional district with a view of injuring a Republican candidate may have no effect at all, but their echo reverberated through surrounding districts where Democratic candidates are down on the league's bad books are likely to be very annoying.

That is, they might be if it were not for the fact that the American people are too sensible to form their judgments as to the service of their Members of Congress on the estimate of the secretary of an association, whose membership and purpose is largely unknown and the sources of whose inspiration are very questionable. That is particularly true when this self-appointed critic only approves 47 out of 435 Members of the Congress which has received the warmest commendation of the President, in a public address, on the volume and the character of its work. Who could have hoped that a Democratic organization anywhere would be fool enough to condemn Congressmen for voting with the administration. That this has happened reminds us of the fact that we frequently have the opposition to thank for blunders that make our success certain.

PROSTITUTION OF PATRIOTIC PROPRIETIES.

Who dares defend the use of the war as a political asset as it was used last April at Camp Grant when the Democratic leaders published advertisements to the Wisconsin soldiers assembled there, as follows:

TUESDAY, APRIL 2.

To the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant:

You are entitled to vote for a United States Senator from Wisconsin. President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for Joseph E. Davies for United States Senator. Davies's election means joy at Washington and gloom at Berlin. Davies's defeat means gloom at Washington and joy at Berlin.

To the credit of the soldiers at Camp Grant, and the people of Wisconsin, be it remembered that their response to what Chairman Hays has characterized as "an infamous prostitution of all patriotic proprieties and the grossest violation of the plainest civil duty," was the election of Senator LENROOT by a handsome majority. I am loath to believe that the Commander in Chief sanctioned such an indefensible use of his name and influence, though no rebuke of it has so far as I know been uttered by him.

THE OLD M'LEMORE STALKING HORSE.

Then there is that famous resolution of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE]. It is true a congressional campaign has come and gone since it was laid on the table, a campaign in which no one, so far as I recall, used it as an issue; but the "war is a Democratic asset," says Vice President MARSHALL, so this old stalking horse is padded up and rolled out as a war issue.

On Wednesday during the debate the gentleman from Texas, the author of the resolution, reminded us of the fact that his resolution of February 17, 1916, calling on the President to "warn our citizens to refrain from traveling on armed ships of the nations at war" was based on a note issued by the Secretary of State the 27th of January, 1916, and which note questioned the right of a belligerent nation in time of war to arm its merchant vessels.

The gentleman might have added that the resolution would in all probability have been forgotten except for the fact that the President, through the very unusual means of a letter to the chairman of the Rules Committee, asked that it be considered and disposed of. The majority desiring to avoid a direct vote moved to lay the resolution on the table. Naturally many Members did not approve of disposing of the resolution in this way and voted against tabling. No one had an opportunity to vote directly for or against the resolution. Few, in my opinion, would have voted for it.

The gentleman from Texas paid his respects to a Democratic colleague who had characterized as infamous a vote against tabling the resolution, and he called attention to the fact that the President had appointed to a high official position, carrying a salary of $10,000 a year, Mr. William Kent, of California, who was one of those who cast one of those so-called infamous votes. Not until our late colleague, Mr. LENROOT, more than two years after the tabling of the resolution, became a candidate for the Senate in Wisconsin did our Democratic friends discover what an abhorrent thing a vote against tabling the resolution was. Mr. LENROOT was elected, we recall, notwithstanding the presidential mandate against him.

KAHN ANTIVOLUNTEERING AMENDMENT.

Those Democrats who are trying to make political capital out of the vote on the Kahn amendment, striking from the first draft bill its volunteering features, have a hard time of it, for unlike the vote against tabling the McLemore resolution which was mostly Republican, a majority of the vote against the Kahn antivolunteering amendment was Democratic and included our honored Speaker, CHAMP CLARK, whose thrilling speech for volunteering we all well remember.

Among the 67 Democrats voting against the amendment striking out the volunteering provisions were such men as the brilliant leader of the Democratic majority, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. KITCHEN; the able chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. PADGETT; the efficient chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. DENT; the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, Mr. BURNETT; that gallant old Union veteran of the Civil War, Gen. SHERWOOD, and others of the most responsibly placed, best known, and strongest men on the Democratic side. A majority of the votes cast against the amendment were theirs. I have no apology to make for having been in their company on that occasion.

Let it be remembered that those who were opposed to striking out the volunteering features compelled compromises which all the country approved. They made the draft ages 21 to 40 (changed to 36 in conference), and only lacked one vote of making it 45 on my motion. This as against the War Department's plan of enrolling and drafting only those from 19 to 26. Their influence preserved the rights of the National Guard and left open in the Regular Army and the Staff Corps volunteer opportunities for 1,000,000 men.

ATTITUDE OF CONGRESS.

But these things are all behind us. Before the European war began, before we entered the conflict, there was abundant room and reason for difference of opinion as to what constituted proper preparedness. It is a matter of history that the President and the majority of his party were among those who were most loath to admit the wisdom of military preparation or the possibility of our becoming involved in the world conflict. But that fact long since ceased to be an issue except as gentlemen on the Democratic side make it an issue through ignoring or misstating the facts. Our faces are to the fore, our thoughts should be of the vital and inspiring present, the hopeful and victorious future with all of its trying problems and its splendid promises.

There is no more inspiring thought than this, that since the beginning of the conflict the American Congress has practically unanimously supported every measure which the administration has deemed essential to furnish the millions of men the billions of money and the tremendously far-reaching authority necessary to put the resources of the mightiest of nations in the balance for right of the world's greatest war.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS.

It would be the most serious indictment that could be drawn against free institutions if there had not been some difference of opinion in the Congress touching the details of the measures proposed. Only the sheerest demagogy and the most unworthy partisanship will seek to magnify those differences into campaign issues in view of the fact that every real doubt has been resolved in favor of the administration's views, and the Congress has only insisted on its view as to substance or detail, where careful consideration and thorough debate has clearly developed that the view of Congress was the correct one.

The espionage law is a case in point. Section 4 of that bill as presented to the House contained most objectionable press censorship and antifree-speech provisions. The House in the Committee of the Whole eliminated the section. A sharp parliamentary procedure in the absence of many Members restored an equally objectionable provision to the bill. Democrats and Republicans who had the courage of their convictions voted against the bill as a protest against these censorship provisions. We all recall the outcome; how the conference report containing modified but still objectionable provisions for censorship was rejected with mandatory instructions to strike out all of the objectionable provisions. As thus purged of an unrighteous and un-American gag law there was not sufficient opposition to the bill to demand a roll call.

LOOKING FORWARD.

When in the providence of God, sustaining the gallant forces of the liberty-loving peoples of the earth, peace shall come, we shall have many trying and important problems of reconstruction, restoration, readjustment to meet and solve, and they will require all of the patience, all of the experience, all of the good judgment that the American people can command. These problems must be met with an open mind, an honest heart, and a broad vision to the end that the liberty, the justice, the democracy for which we fight, shall be vouchsafed to our people.

But for the present our one task is to help win this war. The aims and purposes for which we entered the war, and to the consummation of which we shall wage it to the end, have been clearly stated and aptly phrased by the President. In the pursuit and accomplishment of the Nation's purposes as he has outlined them, the President may be assured of the continued support of the Congress and of the country.

THE NATION'S HEART IS WITH OUR BOYS.

To-day the Nation's heart is over yonder in sunny, shell-torn, war-racked, blood-stained, heroic France. Over yonder along that grim and shifting battle line where hangs the fate of freedom and ordered liberty. Over there with that million and a half of our boys. A mighty host of the stoutest hearts and truest souls ever marshalled on earth. Those boys under our starry standards bear the Nation's soul, the Nation's will, the Nation's unalterable purpose to win a victory for the right. Until victory shall crown our cause every energy, every activity, every effort of the Nation will be centered on the winning of the fields for which our glorious men and our gallant allies contend and the just cause for which they fight.

Behind them we store up the limitless supplies of all things needful to their enterprise. Across the boundless expanse of ocean between us and that host of ours, with the aid of our faithful allies, moves the unending line of convoyed troop and supply ships. The sea wolves race and snarl, but can not impede the ceaseless flow of men and munitions to those fateful battle fields.

At home the anvils ring, the forges glow, the ceaseless din of the steam hammers sound a distant echo to the rattle of the machine guns on the firing line. The farmer plows and reaps in the summer wind and sun, the miner toils in the gloomy gallaries of the mine, the woodsman swings his ax, the herdsman and flock master pursue their daily round of toil, the engineman drives his ever speeding train, the pilot guides his plowing, straining ship, all that we may increase, sustain, and fortify that gallant host yonder amid the hills and on the plains of France.

In every center of industrial activity, in field and farm and forest, in mine and mill, in the marts of trade, in palace, and farm and cottage home, in city tenements, the one absorbing thought and purpose is the cheer and comfort and support of our heart's host over there. The press, the pulpit, the schools, the lyceums, the sewing circles, and the family hearths and homes are all enlisted in the war. Above all the ceaseless activities of a hundred million souls in every walk and avocation of life the dominant inspiring note that colors and shades, solemnizes and inspires, is the master impulse to support those in position of responsibility, and to hearten, strengthen, and increase our enlisting, training, embarking, and embattled hosts, to the end that out of it shall come a victory for justice, righteousness, and peace. To this cause may we all be unselfishly dedicated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss the merits of the bill at this time. On last Thursday the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] placed in the RECORD a letter of Mr. W. H. Hays, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, to Mr. Tumulty, and in order to complete the record of that correspondence I desire to have read at the Clerk's desk the reply to that letter of Mr. Hays by Mr. Tumulty.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SEARS). Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MY DEAR MR. HAYS: I am very glad indeed to have your disclaimer. Although I observed in one of the Washington morning papers an acknowledgment by Republican Chairman Moter, of Kansas, that he had given to the press in that State the interview to which I called your attention, I prefer to accept your own explanation.

The general trend of your letter, however, still leaves doubt in my mind as to the responsiveness of some of the Republican managers to the clearly implied desire of the American people to keep politics out of the war. While the whole thought of President Wilson has been given to the successful prosecution of the war, the foremost leaders of the Republican Party, including yourself and Senator PENROSE, have been making fervent arguments in favor of a restoration of the old political control of the Nation. I have in mind your obviously partisan statement in the New York Times of a short time ago, wherein you said:

"Our coming political activity is not to be lessened. On the contrary, what we want in this country is not 'less politics' but more attention to politics."

Also I recall a recent speech you made in Philadelphia, in which you said:

"We will bring the Government back to the limitations and principles of the Constitution in time of peace and establish policies which will again bind up the wounds of war, renew our prosperity, administer the affairs of the Government with the greatest economy, enlarge our strength at home and abroad, prevent the further spread of the socialistic tendency of the times toward Federal ownership of all the creation and distribution of wealth as a panacea for all the real and fancied ills of society, and put the Nation's feet once more firmly on the path of progress."

I doubt whether the remarks which I have quoted can be interpreted in any way other than as an implied criticism of some of the necessary war policies of the Government, which you claim the Republican Party, as a minority, supported in Congress, and which, you plainly indicate, they would overturn if returned as a majority in Congress. A similar political speech by Senator PENROSE of Pennsylvania makes this assumption of your meaning inevitable. He said:

"I want to say to the Republican Party: Keep it vigorous and virile all through the United States, successful whenever it can be successful, and if under the guidance of the chairman of the national committee we can secure a Republican majority in the House of Representatives at Washington, I believe that we have reached a point in the development of the situation when it will be best to replace the Democratic Party for military improvement and economical efficiency. We are all pulling together in order to stop the war as soon as we possibly can stop it, and then, Mr. Chairman, over and above all the people, by an overwhelming vote, we will vote the Republican Party in control of the American people, as the country has never prospered economically unless it has been under Republican control. Let us keep up an efficient organization in Pennsylvania and all through the United States, and make a successful Republican contest at every opportunity in every congressional district and at the next presidential election, and endeavor to assure the election of Republican candidates."

Even more partisan was the speech of George W. Wickersham, formerly Attorney General of the United States, some weeks ago at a Republican meeting at Lancaster, Pa. He was quoted in the Lancaster Intelligencer as follows:

"See to it that you elect Republican Congressmen—Congressmen who will not be at the beck and call of the President. Also, see to it that the Republican Congressmen who acquiesced in what the President wanted in the last two years are retired."

I am afraid that your quoted speeches, the speech of Senator PENROSE, and your letter of to-day indicate all too plainly that some Republicans find it difficult to think outside the realm of politics. The vast body of Republican voters, now standing with all Democratic voters stanchly behind their Government, doubtless will be interested in any statement you might care to make as to how far you would go in repealing the laws which have made America's participation in the war so effective.

The President's war aims have been made the aims of all the nations fighting against the German Government. These aims have been stated unequivocally by the President upon a number of occasions since the war began. Not merely the American people but all the world is familiar with these aims, which assure "force without stint" until victory is achieved.

It is only through the subtle insinuations that characterize partisan politics that these aims might be diluted with any doubt. It is quite obviously partisan and gratuitous for you to refer to "the imperative necessity of a vigorous prosecution of the war and a conclusive peace only, and the need of a Republican Congress to that end." That this reference was not an inadvertence is shown by the speech of Congressman S. D. FESS, chairman of the Republican national congressional committee, wherein he said:

"Republican success will not only insure the most vigorous prosecution of the war but it will be a guaranty against a compromise and, therefore, an inconclusive peace, 'a peace without victory,' but an assurance of a definite peace dictated by victory on the field."

These statements with reference to an "inconclusive peace" by yourself and Mr. FESS can be regarded either in the light of straw men raised up to be knocked down or as efforts to introduce doubt into a decision which the Government has already announced and upon which the American people are agreed.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPH P. TUMULTY.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] 15 minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, although I think the bill now under consideration is bad, I intend to vote for it, for the reason that we are at war and we need the money to win this war. I believe that everyone should use every energy to see that this war is brought to a successful termination as speedily as possible. The bill under consideration is full of iniquities and inequalities that are greater, so far as certain industries are concerned, than the act of 1917, which the President requested us to amend and to eliminate the bad features. In his address before this body on the 27th day of May, 1918, he used the following language:

The present tax laws are marred, moreover, by iniquities which ought to be remedied. Indisputable facts, every one, and we can not alter or blink them. To state them is argument enough.

I do not believe that the committee has eliminated these inequalities, but to the contrary, so far as it affects certain industries. The inequalities I refer to are the lead and zinc mining and the production of oil and gas in Oklahoma, Missouri, and Kansas and, for that matter, throughout the United States, which is different from the ordinary business. It is full of failures and is highly hazardous and speculative. The risks are such that the incentive is not merely usual interest return on capital invested, as may be the case in other business, but a reward out of proportion to such usual returns. This reward of unusual return comes oftentimes after a fruitless endeavor extending over a period of years in losing or unprofitable adventures, with no return whatever, and usually with total loss of capital.

The incentive that extends the development and opens new mines and new oil and gas wells is the hope of finding some day a mine or well that will compensate for past hardships, privations, and losses. If this incentive is removed, prospecting and extension work will cease. Production of important metals, oil, and gas will be curtailed and possibly eventually stopped.

In the Oklahoma, Missouri, and Kansas districts the average life of mines brought to the point of production is less than three years. My attention has been called to the financial history of 175 mines in that district. These properties reached the point of production with the necessary mills, shafts, and improvements placed on them, and the average productive life was two and three-fifths years. The money invested in these 175 mines was over $5,000,000. The net profits, without depletion or amortization allowance, was $6,600, or $37 profit in each mine. I do not want you to understand from my statement that said district has no mines with longer life, or that they do not yield substantial profits. I present the history of these completed mines in order that you may realize the risks assumed when investments are made in these properties. Such a business can not continue unless the tax bill recognizes the extreme and extraordinary risk, calling for a much larger return on invested capital than if placed where there is no risk, or at least nominal. I also wish to call your attention to the fact that 90 per cent of the oil produced is taken from new wells during the first four years of their existence. At least 50 per cent of this amount is produced during the first year of a well's existence. It is therefore necessary, in order that production may be kept from declining, that new wells in large numbers be drilled; otherwise production will fall off, and in the midst of this great war we will find a shortage of oil, which is so essential to the needs of carrying this war to a successful termination. It is necessary that "wildcatting," as it is termed in the oil fields, should be carried on continuously and that new pools be developed.

History of the oil fields show that less than 1 out of 100 wildcat adventures are successful, over 99 per cent being a total loss to the parties entering upon the undertaking. Less than 10 per cent of successful ventures return to the parties their investments. Of this 10 per cent possibly 2 per cent are big strikes which you hear so much about. It is the incentive to make these big strikes that induces men and companies to enter upon such ventures; as before said, take this incentive away, I am afraid prospecting and wildcatting will practically cease. It is not that the oil men or the miners are not patriotic, for there is not a more patriotic set of men in the United States. They are willing to give up what they have to win this war. But they feel that they should be placed in such a position before making such a hazardous venture that they at least should have a fair return in proportion to the risk, if they should be successful, as is allowed less hazardous industries. The proposed bill allows a credit of 8 per cent on capital invested to all business, disregarding the varying hazards and risks of investments. Banking is allowed the same credit as mining and wildcatting for oil. In the field heretofore mentioned less than 10 per cent of the mining ventures ever reach the producing stage, and less than 25 per cent of those reaching the point of production recover back their capital. If this were the record of banking investments, we know there would be very little banking in this country.

Men face this chance because of the hope of final reward in a good strike; this bill removes the reward.

The law should at least give to oil producers and miners of this character, where the life is short and uncertain, 15 per cent credit on capital; again, depletion and depreciation allowances should be so provided and administered that the tax would be on profit and not capital. As now administered the capital is returned by depletion and depreciation of allowances over the estimated life of the individual mine. This may and oftentimes works a great hardship. A miner may invest $30,000 in a mine with an estimated life of three years. He takes out one-third of the ore; for the first year, earning $25,000. He has been allowed heretofore to deduct for his gross earnings $10,000, being the return of one-third of capital, leaving a taxable earning of $15,000. Under this proposed bill a very large part of this will be taken as a tax; later, as is often the case in the mines, it is found that the life has been overestimated and no further profit is made. The entire venture will have been a loss, but the miner has been required to pay a tax on $15,000 earnings of the first year. This is a tax on capital, not income. The same principle will apply to an oil well which is drilled at a cost of, say, $50,000, and, as frequently happens, at the end of two or two and one-half years the oil is completely exhausted. During the first year there is probably produced $25,000 in oil; possibly $5,000 during the next year before the well becomes dry; however, the producer is allowed to deduct from his gross earnings $4,166.67, being the return of one-sixth of the capital, leaving a taxable earning of $20,833.33; and if the venture the following year becomes a loss the producer has been required to pay a tax upon said $20,833.33 of the earnings of the first year, and, as before stated, this would be a tax on capital and not on income.

In my judgment, at least, discretionary power should be placed with the department to allow a more rapid return of capital where the life of the mine or well is short and uncertain.

Section 312 is very unfair to the miners and the oil producers of our district in allowing only 10 per cent credit on capital invested, where the corporation had no prewar earnings that might be allowed as a credit. The corporation with a prewar record is entitled to the full average earnings for the prewar period free from tax, while the new companies are limited to 10 per cent. Ten per cent return on mining and oil investments in other fields may be a fairly normal return; of this I have no knowledge, but I am quite sure that in the field for which I now speak 10 per cent on invested capital is in no sense a normal return. In the State of Oklahoma money may be loaned on real estate for 8, 9, and 10 per cent, with no risk.

Because of the short life of our mines more than 95 per cent of our operating properties have no prewar record, and on account of the Mid-Continent oil field being practically a new oil field, at least 75 per cent of the operating properties have no prewar record. These will be confined to the 10 per cent credit. I think the very least that we should do would be to allow new corporations the same credit that is allowed representative corporations similarly circumstanced; otherwise in my district a very unfair discrimination is made against the new company.

The proposed bill in section 311 provides a tax of 80 per cent on all profits over the credits allowed under section 312. The credit is prewar earnings, or 10 per cent of capital, if there be no prewar record. If this is an attempt to take earnings brought about by war conditions or demands, I see no objection to it and it should be paid, but the proposed bill is so drawn that oil properties and mines will fall into the 80 per cent tax class, for in no case do I believe that the oil properties or the mines in my district are enjoying any war profits. On the contrary, I believe that the profits of the oil producer and the lead and zinc miners would be greater if there was no war.

The Oklahoma lead and zinc miners are producing many times the output of the prewar period and the net income is larger, but it is because of finding larger and richer deposits. War conditions have in fact reduced the profits per unit. If the intention is to get war profits it would be an easy matter under the rules of the department to take a war profit per unit.

I call your attention to the provision in section 336, on page 68, prohibiting the return of tax on so-called consolidated returns. The constitution of the State of Oklahoma prohibits corporations owning real estate outside of cities and incorporated towns, except a sufficient amount upon which to conduct its business. The result is that mining corporations may only hold small tracts upon which operations are actually conducted. The practice follows of holding the ownership of the fee or leases by holding company or association, and if a small tract is proven to be productive territory a subsidiary corporation is organized for operating purposes, and in most cases the stock issued is nominal. Usually a contract is issued to the operating company without any particular consideration, the corporation being formed only for convenience, the owner in each company being identical. To prohibit classing this as one business is unjust and will, under the terms of this bill, be ruinous to many operating oil and mining companies of Oklahoma organized in this way for nominal issue of stock. The bill should contain some provision permitting a consolidated return of companies organized for the purpose of entering such hazardous undertakings or ventures as the production of oil and gas or the mining of lead and zinc. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the administration of the soldiers' and sailors' insurance act and some details in connection with it, which it seems to me are worthy of the attention of the House and of the country as well.

I am sure that every American heart thrills to-day with pride in the news that comes from the front. As we read of the achievements of our soldiers, how they are adding new glory to the American flag, and causing the fear of American prowess to seize the souls of our country's enemies, I am sure that every American heart responds. The people of this country are to-day united as never before in the support of our boys over yonder. Some of the people of this country, perhaps, did not favor entering the war; some, perhaps, have not approved of all the details of policy entered upon; yet I want to say that my faith in the American people, both native and naturalized, is such that I believe there is not one in a million who does not want to see this war won, who does not want to see it won quickly, or who does not hope and pray with all his soul that to-day is but the beginning of a forward movement which will plant the Stars and Stripes upon the Schloss in Berlin, and end in complete victory for ourselves and our associates in the war. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have voted for every measure for sustaining our soldiers and sailors. I have voted for every measure which tended to make their lot better. I am definitely pledged until the very end to give our boys upon the ships and in the field absolutely the best of everything that may be required—the best arms, the best clothing and supplies, and the very best treatment and care that can be furnished them. I feel that if there are sacrifices in the way of food and clothing to be made, they should be made by the people here at home. If anybody is to go on scant rations, it is for the civilian population to do that. I would not have those boys stinted in the slightest degree, nor any economy or saving practiced in supporting them.

Next to our soldiers at the front, the ones who are the objects of my solicitude and nearest to my heart are their wives and parents here at home, and the children they have left behind. Having the protection of those dependents in mind, I voted for the soldiers' and sailors' insurance act, containing its insurance allotment and allowance provisions. I felt that it was our duty to make our men contented over there, and knew that they could not be contented and could not show the highest efficiency unless they were confident that their loved ones at home were being cared for.

It is too much to ask even of a devoted and patriotic American soldier, that he shall do his best upon a foreign battle field, knowing all the time that at home there are little children, his little children, reaching out their hands in hunger, and that his wife or his parents are not being fed and clothed as they should be. I am not willing that a soldier's dependents should suffer, yet I fear that in some degree it is transpiring, notwithstanding the providence of Congress in the matter. We passed an insurance and allotment and allowance act which we believed would provide for the dependents of soldiers in the very best way—a liberal act which was without precedent and which had no parallel in the war legislation of other countries; a most beneficent law. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in the administration of this act there has been a falling short, and that some benefits of that act are being withheld from those for whom they were intended. I want to call the attention of the House to some details of that kind.

Take the matter of allotments to a soldier's parents or other dependents who are placed in class B, to whom the soldier is not compelled by the law to make an allotment but who are entitled to no Government allowance if no allotment is made to them. As a rule, allotments are made by soldiers unfamiliar with the law, and are taken by officers who are just as ignorant of the law as the soldier himself. In many instances the soldiers fail to claim allowances for their dependents, although they contributed to their support, and they would have been justified in so doing. These allotments came into the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance and were paid for a considerable period. In many instances where allowances were not claimed, the parent or other dependent was permitted to assert a claim of dependence and to get an allowance through the bureau.

But recently that practice has been changed. Congress passed an amendment to the act, which was approved June 25, 1918. I am confident that nobody in the House or in either branch of Congress imagined that anything in that amendment would be construed as changing the administration of the law in the respect I have mentioned. But in the process of its construction officials have been able to hold that they are authorized under the amended act to cancel all allotments to dependents where allowances have not been claimed by the soldier or allowed by the bureau. As a result of that construction of the law nearly 300,000 soldiers' allotments have been canceled. There is the general impression among the Members of the House that these allotments are merely turned back to the War Department and will be paid through the Quartermaster General. I want to correct that impression. It is unfounded. Every one of these allotments is canceled, ended, and terminated, and the only chance the parent or other dependent of class B has to get an allotment in such a case is for the soldier to sign a new blank—a new paper. Perhaps this soldier, far away on the fields of France, is wounded, perhaps in a hospital, sick and far from home. It is necessary that he should sign a new blank, or else his dependents at home will get absolutely nothing.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will allow me, I have taken up this same thing that the gentleman is speaking of, and I have been informed that cablegrams were sent to the officers in France before the 30th of June requesting them to take the matter up with the boys and have them send new allotments. I do not know whether anything of that sort has come through. The only letters I have seen have been dated about the 27th of August, saying that the allotments were stopped as of the 30th of June. I think that is very unjust.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have a sample form letter such as the bureau sends out in these cases:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington.

You will no longer receive checks from this bureau for the voluntary allotments which the bureau has previously sent you, but if the enlisted man who has already been notified of this discontinuance desires to continue this allotment he will do so through the "Quartermaster General's Office, Washington, D. C.," for men enlisted in the Army; the "Navy Allotment Office, Washington, D. C.," for men enlisted in the Navy; the "Paymaster, United States Marine Corps Headquarters, Washington, D. C.," for men enlisted in the Marine Corps; or the "Captain Commandant, Washington, D. C.," for men enlisted in the Coast Guard.

If you correspond further in regard to this matter, you should write to the enlisted man or to the office mentioned above, according to the service in which he is enlisted.

Do not write to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, as it no longer has charge of this particular case.

Very truly, yours,

C. F. NESBIT, Commissioner,
By ——— ———.

In about 300,000 American homes—some of them destitute homes, where the parents are depending on their soldier sons' allotments for bread—they have received a cold printed form saying "your allotment is discontinued as of June 30." They do not understand it, they do not know why, and they are writing to Members of Congress. They have heard nothing from the sons over yonder of any reason for the cutting off of their pittance of support. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] says that an order has gone by cable. I do not know whether it has or not, but if it has it has been ineffective. The soldiers have not signed the new form. They do not understand why it is necessary. They have already made allotments, and the result is that in the greater number of 300,000 homes there is going to be a great deal of suffering before they can get the new blanks signed.

Mr. DOMINICK. In the case of the change of payment of these allotments, was it not made as a matter of bookkeeping, a change from the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance to the quartermaster's depot of the Army?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have just explained that that is not the case, and that it involves the discontinuance of allotment and the signing of a new blank entirely.

Mr. DOMINICK. My information is——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman's information is incorrect, I am giving him real information. [Laughter.] Some of the allotments have been paid one or two months, others longer, and then, irrespective of the length of time, are now totally discontinued. These allotments, many of them, were made when the soldier had just left home, when the memory of his family was fresh in his mind, when the domestic ties newly sundered were fresh and bleeding, perhaps the boy had just gone from his mother's arms. Now, he has been away for months; he is in France; he finds that he wants more money than he has got. Perhaps he will not sign the new allotment, perhaps he has forgotten the old folks at home. Perhaps the parents at home, actually destitute and suffering for the allotment, will never get it again.

Mr. DOMINICK. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not know upon what the gentleman from Alabama bases the statement that my understanding was incorrect.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman wishes to ask me a question, I hope he will do it, as my time is passing.

Mr. DOMINICK. I want to set myself straight.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman can do that in his own time, I can not give him mine, and I hope the gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. DOMINICK. I simply want to ask this question: The gentleman seems to be informed as to the present procedure in regard to this matter, and I want to ask in case an allotment is discontinued by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, if the terms of that allotment are not continued by the depot quartermaster?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have said—and this makes the third time—that it is totally discontinued, and the allottee will get nothing until the soldier signs another allotment blank.

Mr. DOMINICK. My information from the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is otherwise.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I hope the gentleman will get himself straight, for he is wholly mistaken.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Alabama is correct and the gentleman from South Carolina is wrong. The whole trouble about the matter is that when this matter was transferred from the War-Risk Insurance Bureau to the Army and Navy the Army and Navy would not take the facts and figures of allotments made in the War-Risk Bureau, which statistics have been ready to be turned over to them at any time, but they refused to take them and have demanded the new thing.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that in stopping it the War-Risk Insurance Bureau notified each allottee that there had been a change of method and that there would be some delay in sending future allotments?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No.

Mr. BLANTON. That is my information.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have stated the facts, and the gentleman's misinformation does not change them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is there not a provision in the soldiers' and sailors' insurance law which allows the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance to turn over to the Quartermaster General's Department in the matter of pay, paying all allotments in excess of $15 a month?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have not been able to find anything of that kind.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman will admit that it has been done.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not know what the gentleman has in mind. I do know that all allotments to class B dependents, where the allowances are not claimed, have been canceled absolutely, not turned over to anybody to be paid, and never can be paid unless the soldier signs a new document. Many will not sign, and the result is going to be a great hardship to a multitude of deserving but destitute parents.

Mr. KNUTSON. I was informed at the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance that where a soldier has made an allotment of $20 $15 would be continued to be paid by the War-Risk Bureau of Insurance and $5 would be paid by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The point that the gentleman makes is not germane to what I am talking about. I am not absolutely sure, but it is my information, that wherever the allotment exceeds $15 the excess is canceled, and if the sailor or soldier wants to allot anything in excess he must sign a new allotment, and payments of the excess are made through the Quartermaster General's office.

I want to say this further. As I expressed myself when this act was being considered in the House, I can not see any reason for putting a dependent father and mother in class B so that the soldier may make them an allotment if he wants to, or let it alone if he wants to, and that they may get an allowance from the Government if only by grace of the soldier they get an allotment. I have never been able to perceive how dependents can be arbitrarily distinguished in merits one from the other. I have never been able to understand why this bill came in here originally and was passed by the House guaranteeing support to a soldier's wife, who might be a young woman and able to work and support herself, whereas his mother, who might be old and poor and sick and absolutely dependent upon charity, would not be able to get a cent.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DECKER. Is it not the law in the gentleman's State that a man must support his wife, that he is compelled to by law, whereas there is no legal compulsion to support his parents?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am happy to say that I live in a more civilized community than would tolerate any such law. [Applause in the gallery.] I am here to say that in my State——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will admonish the people in the gallery that applause is forbidden in the gallery under the rules of the House.

The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] will pardon my impatience with interruptions that do not relate to this particular subject. I am trying to say some things that I think the House ought to know and that seem to be the subject of much misinformation in the House. Proceeding a little further along that line, I call attention to the provisions made for class A dependents. Under the law, if the husband does not make an allotment to his wife, she may file a claim for a compulsory allotment. That would seem to be fairly satisfactory, but under the practice, under the law as administered by the bureau, it is not satisfactory. For illustration, I have in mind this kind of an actual case. Members will understand a concrete case better than merely an abstract statement of the practice. In January last I filed a wife's application for a compulsory allotment. The husband claimed an exemption from the allotment on the ground that the wife had deserted him, which was wholly untrue. He simply wanted the money for himself. He was an unworthy husband. The case has run along and is still pending in the bureau, no final action having ever been taken upon it, notwithstanding the fact that on June 28 the husband withdrew his claim of exemption, said it was unfounded, and authorized the allotment to be made. Yet no compulsory allotment has been obtained from him and no payments have yet been made to the wife, and she has been for over six months absolutely without support except so far as friends and relatives have furnished it to her.

It would be thought that when award is finally made on that kind of a claim the arrearage would be paid so as to enable this wife to pay the debts that she has incurred for her support during the time the matter was delayed. Nothing of the kind occurs. The award, if made to-day, will extend only to the month of September and the allowance and allotment will date from now. Nothing will be paid her in the way of arrearage unless the military authorities are able to check against this man's pay the monthly payments which should have been made in the past. That is, of course, a matter of long time. The checking can only be made month by month as the soldier's pay accrues, and it takes away all of the soldier's pay, whereas before he retained one-half of it, with the result that there is a dissatisfied soldier, possibly a deserter, and a court-martial. The soldier, in other words, is left without pay altogether. That is the situation in a case like that. You would think by all means that the allowance—the part that the Government pays—would be dated back to the date the soldier went into the service, because the Government absolutely owes that to the woman. The law expressly gives it to her, but the practice of the bureau deprives her of the benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOODS].

Mr. WOODS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, America is now a full partner in the greatest war in the history of the world. Her entrance into the struggle has brought new courage, strength, and endurance into the war-worn armies of the allies. Together they are now guarding the temple of individual liberty—American liberty.

Upon America falls the larger burden of maintaining and enlarging the allied man power, of feeding those armies, and of financing their operations. This is a war between nations, between peoples, not simply a struggle between armies. It is up to the people here at home to be unceasing in the work of bringing governmental, industrial, and agricultural organization to the highest possible state of perfection.

No man can say that he is without opportunity to assist in winning the war. The grave problem confronting the American Government is a problem equally grave to every American citizen, and if that citizen is to bear his share of the burden of American citizenship he must say to himself, "The problems of my Government are my problems. It is my duty to understand these problems; to meet the just demands made upon me; to contribute in every thought, word, and deed to the common cause."

The lesson we must teach the Old World monarchies is that a representative republic, composed of 100,000,000 industrious, peace-loving citizens, can defeat organized militarism and yet preserve through it all freedom for the individual. To teach that lesson we must maintain the ideals of American Government. Ours is a representative government, and a departure from government by the people through their chosen representatives would mean autocracy. We should not permit politics to enter into the war, nor the war to enter into politics. The one is destructive of the efficient conduct of the war, the other destroys the fundamental principles of our form of government. Therefore I am not in harmony with the policy of certain politicians who continually nag President Wilson in his efforts to prosecute the war.

There can be no partisan patriotism. We must all make whatever sacrifices are necessary. These sacrifices must be made by the individual, by the party organization, and by political parties, to the end of winning the war at the earliest possible hour. The one big thing that towers above all else in America, that must dominate the ideal, effort, and thought of every individual, and every organization, whether it be commercial, social, or political, is to win the war. The Republican Party is committed to this achievement, and will not swerve from this course. Its every act must have this in view. An economical administration of the affairs of government in the conduct of the war will materially aid in its prosecution. The Republican Members of this House should advocate unanimously the enactment of certain constructive legislation, and thus insure the support of the country in the coming election. They can do this by uniting their efforts to pass a law carrying out the party platform pledge for the creation of a simple businesslike budget system.

The last Democratic platform contains a declaration implying that at some time the adoption of a budget system would be a wise measure, and suggests that an intermediate step be taken to open the way for such a reform. It does not affirmatively advocate the immediate creation of the budget system. A few attempts have been made at various times by certain Democrats in the House to consider this intermediate measure, but the Democrats themselves on each occasion have prevented any progress. This is not surprising. The Democratic Party has never been cohesive, and therefore it is not to be expected that they would unite upon the matter. The Republican Party has an established record for cohesive action and constructive legislation, and therefore more is expected of the Republican Party than of the Democratic Party.

During the absence of the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], there has been no Republican leadership uniting the party in an aggressive effort to enact constructive legislation. This is due largely to the fact that the Republicans are in a minority, and have been supporting, and should continue to support, necessary war measures, irrespective of the attitude of the Democrats. But the budget system is, or should be, a war measure, and if the war, through some unforeseen contingency, lasts longer than is expected, it will become a war measure of even more vital character.

This principle ultimately must be adopted if we are to deal honestly with the taxpayer. It is time we devoted our energies, not so much to endeavor to swell the public purse by new expedients in taxation, but to more serious efforts to stop the holes through which our resources are constantly leaking. Conservation of our resources never will be practiced successfully so long as our present system of financing obtains.

Many Republican Members of the House have recognized the unsoundness of our present fiscal system. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE], on April 6, presented an admirable discussion of the question, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] furnished the House with an exhaustive analysis compiled jointly by himself and Charles Walter Collins, author of "The National Budget System and American Finance." This compilation has been published as House Document 1006, and I quote therefrom:

* * * There is no policy or program in our finances at all at any time. * * *

* * * We thus proceed each year with complete lack of equilibrium. Department is not balanced with department, nor expenditure with revenue. After all of the appropriation bills are in—several months after the opening of the session—we bring in a revenue bill to cover them. When these bills are passed Congress washes its hands of the whole matter. * * *

* * * The people have no way of knowing what is going on. There is no publicity except such items as find their way to the press from time to time. Secrecy, obscurity, inefficiency, duplication, and waste abound. No one can clearly see the hands that reach into the Public Treasury. * * *

We have entered the war with this old discredited system. Under it at the last session of Congress we appropriated over $20,000,000,000, and we are in a fair way to repeat that orgy of finance at this session. We are attempting the impossible. We are attempting to finance the most stupendous enterprise in the history of the world upon principles and by methods which no sane man would defend. And if we do not right ourselves we shall face the acute problems of reconstruction in the same shiftless way.

In June, 1912, President Taft, in a message to Congress, transmitted a report of the Commission on Economy and Efficiency on the subject of the need for a national budget. This was followed by another message from President Taft submitting for the consideration of Congress a budget, with supporting memoranda and reports. In this message of February, 1913, the President recommended that Congress—

Make some organic provision whereby the administrative and legislative branch may coordinate their efforts in the development of the future activities of the Government as well as for the determination of the expenditures needed for the current transaction of its business.

As soon as the Democrats obtained control of the Government they promptly cut out all appropriations for the expenses of the Commission on Economy and Efficiency. So it is plainly apparent that nothing will be done by the Democratic Party looking toward the immediate creation of a budget system. It is therefore the opportunity and the duty of the Republicans as a party to act, and, so far as lies within its power, to redeem the pledge made in the national Republican platform of 1916.

The Republican Party went on record in national convention in its platform of 1916 in favor of the establishment of a simple, businesslike budget system necessary to effect a needed reform in the administration of national finances. When this declaration was made by the Republican Party we were at peace and the problem of national finances was relatively less important. Since then America has entered the war, expenditures have increased enormously, and the need of a budget system, therefore, is magnified proportionately.

In the near future there will be another drive for the sale of a very large amount of Government bonds. There is also a continuous effort to obtain contributions for the Red Cross, the Knights of Columbus, Young Men's Christian Association, and other war-relief work. I am sure the people would buy liberty bonds and make these contributions with more confidence if a simple, businesslike budget system were promptly established to prevent the present waste prevailing under our fiscal methods.

At this period, when the Government is asking the people to raise $8,000,000,000 by direct taxation, it seems to me it is the duty of Congress to establish a system of sound governmental financing. The creation of a budget system will do this. It will stimulate greater enthusiasm and cooperation among the people, concentrating all our energies and resources for winning the war. It will be a vital factor in preparing for the inevitable world-wide struggle for commercial and industrial advancement when peace is declared and will lead to a more economic expenditure of the vast sums of money paid into the Treasury.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, the last revenue bill, which became the act of October 3, 1917, was about the most complicated and inequitable affair of the kind ever perpetrated upon a patient, patriotic people. Its tax rates were higher than necessary to produce the revenue at that time desired, as the returns already have demonstrated; some of its items were purposely designed to hit certain classes of people, who were openly described as "wanting the war," and therefore should pay for it; and it contained the iniquitous 8 per cent tax on all labor incomes above $6,000, superimposed on the individual income-tax rates, on the theory that if a man works for his money he should pay a higher tax than the man who draws his income purely from investments. That was a curious theory to come from a party which calls itself democratic, but it was stoutly defended on the floor of this House, though no one seemed to understand just what the 8 per cent tax, which had been put in at the eleventh hour in conference, meant nor just how far-reaching it would prove to be. It naturally met with a storm of criticism, and has been dropped from the bill before us, which does not, however, make any distinction in rates between labor incomes and investment incomes in favor of the former, as England and some other countries do.

The income-tax rates of the act of October 3, 1917, were piled on top of the rates of the two previous revenue acts in such a way that not even a Philadelphia lawyer could tell how to make out a return, and the Treasury officials were so long in endeavoring to formulate regulations which should have some appearance of clearness that the time for filing returns had to be extended a month. It was worse yet with the corporation and excess-profits tax. No corporation knows yet whether its returns were made out in accordance with the law, and none of them will know until a year or two from now, when the army of additional clerks and inspectors made necessary by the law's obscurity have time to go over those returns and figure them up in accordance with some finally determined standard. If the time lost by conscientious taxpayers, anxious to pay the Government every cent due under the law, in trying to figure up what their returns should be, in consultations over the matter with lawyers and so-called experts, could have been saved and devoted to productive work, it would have been an appreciable contribution toward the winning of the war.

This bill is better in some important respects. It consolidates the rates of the preceding acts, and its language, so far as I have been able to give it study, seems to be reasonably clear. It drops the 8 per cent tax and does not submit individuals to either the excess-profits or the new war-profits tax. But it is subject to the criticism that it shows a considerable amount of the same ideas that dominated in the formation of its predecessors. Its authors have either not yet become convinced that the American people as a whole are heart and soul for the war and willing, every man and woman, to pay their just share, or else they have been animated by a desire to do a little political profiteering out of the fact that general taxes have not been levied. Yet these so-called consumption taxes have merely been postponed, and it has already been admitted that they will have to be levied in the near future to make up for the losses of revenue due to the ban upon brewing. It would have been better to place these taxes in the bill at rather low rates, to be raised later if necessary, than to leave them out entirely. When levied they will have the appearance of having been levied to make prohibition unpopular.

The so-called luxury taxes or excise taxes of Title IX of the bill are so graded as to get what little revenue they will raise out of the same people who pay the income taxes, and as revenue producing taxes some of them strike me as being ridiculous. If you want to get revenue out of the sale of valises and traveling bags why put the exemption as high as $25? That will simply mean that no revenue whatever will be raised from that article, or not enough to be worth counting. Why put the limit of men's suits or women's suits at $50? That will simply drive the customs tailors out of business and drive everybody to the department stores. As a revenue-raising proposition the limit of exemptions in section 905 ought to be reduced in most instances one-half and the rate of taxation at the same time reduced one-half—from 20 per cent to 10 per cent. A large number of people, all of whom could well afford to pay something, would then pay a small tax, easily ascertainable, over a minimum that would still remain high enough to enable anybody under the necessity of rigidly economic living to keep under it. A very good serviceable suit of clothes can still be bought for $25, and a good hat for $2.50. Putting the limit on men's hats at $5 means that not one man in a thousand will pay any tax. I do not recall ever having paid $5 for a hat myself, except for a silk hat, which, while now of somewhat ancient vintage, still serves well enough for the few occasions where it seems to be a necessary nuisance. It seems to me that this section 209 shows politics or cowardice, or both, rather than a desire to raise revenue for the support of the war.

The high taxes upon business enterprise, taking away from corporations and individuals their reinvestment funds, have already made necessary the assumption of more and more of the war work by the Government, and have made necessary in increasing amount the loaning of Government money to enterprises absolutely essential to the prosecution of the war. I venture to say that a study of the records of the War Finance Corporation will show that the Government has loaned money to some of the very same corporations from whom it has taken large sums in excess-profits taxes. In other words, these corporations doing war work are having taken from them funds absolutely essential for the expansion of their business to meet the needs of the war, and then in order to prevent the work from coming to a standstill the Government is loaning them their money back. Yet the surtaxes and excess-profits rates in this bill are doubled.

Already some large concerns have been driven out of business by high taxes and various restrictions upon raw materials and upon transportation. If they are nonessential industries and if their labor forces are needed in shipbuilding or munition work perhaps their closing can not be helped, but it is going to be a serious question how far this discouraging of industries is to be carried. The building industries may be mentioned as among those hardest hit in many localities where there has been no building of war factories or cantonments, and in connection with the buliding industry the brickmaking industry seems to have been perhaps the hardest hit of all.

This is an absolutely essential industry in normal times and it seems as if some provision should be made by the Government to tide over such industries ruined or so reduced as to be forced to the verge of bankruptcy because of the war and of the Government's arbitrary, though perhaps necessary, rulings with regard to transportation, fuel, and materials. If excess-profits taxes are to be paid by the concerns that happen to be making money, it would seem no more than fair that some part of the funds so raised should go toward keeping from bankruptcy industries that have suffered excess losses through no fault of their own. As a case in point, an extreme and exceptional case doubtless, I was told on a recent visit home of an action to foreclose a mortgage of $12,000 on a brickyard that had cost to construct and equip some $75,000, and the yard actually had on hand brick that could be sold in the market to-day for $14,000, or $2,000 more than the face of the mortgage, but the railroad or transportation director would not furnish the necessary cars or river barges. No such thing as that should be allowed to happen in a free country. We have passed a soldiers' and sailors' civil-rights bill, but have failed to afford any protection to the people ruined by the arbitrary acts of government growing out of the necessities of war.

I believe that the Ways and Means Committee ought to come to a realization that the people are back of the Commander in Chief and of the boys in the trenches, and are willing to pay their fair share of the cost of maintaining them till the war is won. The committee has been overfearful about letting everybody have a share. In the main it has done its work well and has resisted the blandishments of the cranks that have been before it as well as most of the special pleas of interests that have sought a measure of exemption, but there is a little of the income-conscription idea in the bill, and in closing I want to say a word about the agitation or propaganda for so-called income conscription.

If you will look through your files, supposing that you have saved the various letters sent to every Member of Congress in favor of various schemes of taxation, and supposing also that you have saved the letters of the various propagandists before we entered the war, you will at once be struck by the fact that the conscription of incomes has had the support in many instances of the very same people who were urging us two years or more ago to vote against preparedness, who urged us to support the McLemore resolution, who tried by every conceivable device to prevent the manufacture and exportation of arms and ammunition to our allies; the very same people who frantically urged us not to support the President when he asked for the adoption of the armed-ship resolution, and the same people who frantically urged us not to vote for the declaration of war in April of last year; the same people again who opposed the passage of the draft act. It is as plain as sunlight at noonday that these propagandists who had been playing the pro-German game throughout did not acknowledge themselves beaten, but simply started on a new line of propaganda—to do what they could to make the financing of the war difficult or impossible. They cunningly calculated, or their German instructors, carefully concealed in the background, calculated, that if they could pull down the men of wealth and enterprise and initiative they would stop the progress of the country and by degrees reduce it to the same condition to which Russia has been reduced, so that the great Republic of America would ultimately become an easy prey for the Kaiser and the Prussian junkers, just as Russian has.

To prove the truth of what I have said, I need mention only one conspicuous name, as typical of many—Amos Pinchot. You all have his letters and his frantic advertising in your files. As a more recent instance I might mention also Mayor Thompson, of Chicago, who apparently has happily been defeated for the senatorial nomination in Illinois. He is reported to have been going throughout the State declaring that while he was opposed to our entering the war and opposed to the raising of an army by the only means possible for the raising of a large army, he is in favor of "the conscription of incomes." It is so easy to say, and has such a seductive sound, such latent elements of popularity that this propaganda is undoubtedly the most insidious, the most cunningly contrived, the most dangerous of all the German propagandism so persistently circulated in this country. We have plenty of bolsheviki in this country who have taken it up and echoed it and carried it along, and like the propaganda that preceded it, this has caught in its meshes not a few good and honest men of patriotic impulses, who have failed to see the concealed hand of the Kaiser pulling the strings. I am sure that a little better knowledge of the economics of taxation, a little more of the spirit of fair play, together with consideration of the sources whence this latest propagandism draws its chief inspiration, will drive it into hiding along with its discredited predecessors, many of whose leaders are now languishing in jail or in detention camps.

I believe the surtaxes are already so high as to discourage individual initiative in many cases, in view of the definition of income given in this bill and in the preceding law. In the popular mind the word "income" implies a somewhat regular receipt of funds, such as rents, dividends, interest, or salaries, and does not apply to extraordinary gains from some hazardous venture, or from the sale of some property which may have been slowly advancing in value for some time, but all these gains even though reinvested to produce a further steady income are gathered as income under the terms of the bill. This must discourage investors, and all persons whose undertakings involve considerable risk. The high surtaxes have already caused apprehension over the next liberty loan, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself has asked that some further exemption for the bonds be given, and we have already, yesterday, granted that exemption up to as high as $30,000.

ESTATES TAX.

I believe there should have been some effort made to raise revenue from tariff on imports. The Tariff Commission has just completed studies on pearl buttons and on glass. The imports of pearl buttons have increased enormously, more than 1,000 per cent, since the war began, and a considerably increased revenue might just as well be secured from them as not. We do not at present need protection, but we do need revenue, and this is the time, if ever there was one, for "a tariff for revenue only," yet no effort in that direction has been made. Of course, a complete revision of the tariff would take many months, but what has become of the once much-vaunted Democratic principle of "revision by schedules"? Surely it would have been easy to raise a few hundred millions of dollars without any general revision.

I want to say, as I said when the last revenue bill was up for consideration, that I do not think an estate tax a fair war tax. It subtracts from the capital of the country, as my colleague [Mr. MERRITT] said the other day, puts capital in the hands of the Government to be dissipated. It is not a tax in any true sense of the word, but a confiscation of capital. And it penalizes the soldiers who die in battle. They must lose property which should go to the support of their wives and children. They ought certainly to be exempted if it be continued.

In conclusion I want to say again that the committee and Congress should trust the people and not be afraid to tax them, if the taxes are fair and just. They are willing to pay what is right. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, our first concern is to win the war and place the cost thereof where it will result in the least distress.

We did not go into this war to make millionaires, and the man who is taking advantage of our stress in order to make a personal fortune is just as much an enemy of the Republic as is the Kaiser. In the great national crisis we must think, not of ourselves and our personal fortunes, but of the country and those heroic Americans who are holding aloft the torch of human freedom in France. This war already has, and will continue to cost a large toll in blood and treasure, but the American people stand ready to pay the price. They only ask that there be no waste, or worse. Just as our boys are the bravest of the brave, so are the American people the truest of the true, and the same spirit that sustained the starving and freezing army of Washington at Valley Forge will win this war. We must win at all costs, and it must be a decisive victory, such as will make for a repetition of the awful carnage an impossibility.

Mr. Chairman, Congress has enacted many war measures at the request of the administration, and some of these measures have been operated to the disadvantage of the masses. I refer especially to the food-control act of which so much was expected. That measure allowed the President to fix the price of wheat, which was set at $2.20 per bushel at the terminal market. As a war measure the consumption of wheat was greatly restricted and the use of a number of substitutes, such as corn, rye, and barley, was enjoined upon us in its stead, hence the people were not greatly benefited by such price fixing, for no effort was made to set a fair price for the wheat substitutes, which immediately commenced to soar until they equaled and surpassed the price of wheat.

When the Food Administration first promulgated its regulations as to substitutes, rice was selling at about 7 cents per pound retail. If the report of the Federal Trade Commission can be relied upon, and I have every reason to believe it may, the large packers went into the market and cornered the rice crop of the world, with the result that rice increased 65 per cent in a few weeks' time. What is true of rice is equally true of other substitutes. Other trusts and combinations have also embraced the opportunity to take advantage of our present situation. Especially is this true of clothing, footwear, cotton goods, farm machinery, and so forth. Apparently no effort has been made to curb the greed of the profiteer, who is employing every agency at his command to take advantage of our stress and needs. Huge fortunes have been made from this war, and the end is not yet. With many greed has supplanted patriotism, which is spelled "profit" in the Temple of Mammon.

For the second time since war was declared has this Congress been called upon to enact a revenue measure. The revenue bill passed last year did not provide a sufficient amount for our needs, and it is necessary to make further increases at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to pay the members of the Ways and Means Committee a deserved compliment. For three long and weary months they have labored faithfully and well. The measure evolved by that body calls for the raising of $8,000,000,000, or $8 for every minute since the time of Christ; a sum that staggers the imagination, and will probably stand for all time to come as the greatest financial measure ever evolved by the mind of man, and the American people will see in it the product of the minds of a group of men who have set partisanship aside for country and humanity.

Gentlemen, the wage earner, the farmer, and the average business and professional man can not stand another increase in taxes without great hardship. The increased cost of living, which is inexcusable and indefensible, has far outstripped the increase in wages and incomes of the masses, and we must look elsewhere for the enormous sum asked for by the Treasury Department.

Where, then, shall we look? We must look to those who have profited most from the war and to those who are best able to carry the new burden. I refer to those who have exceedingly liberal contracts with this Government that are bringing in millions in war profits.

On March 23 I introduced H. R. 10977, which sought to impose a graduated income and earnings tax in excess of that now proposed by the Ways and Means Committee. Beginning with a tax of 10 per cent on incomes of $10,000, 25 per cent on $25,000, 50 per cent on $50,000, it would place a tax of 90 per cent on everything in excess of $100,000. Over a year ago I advocated making this a pay-as-we-go war, so far as possible. I then advocated that the burdens of this war should be apportioned according to one's ability to assume such burden. Taxes to be just must be equitable and apportioned according to the ability of those taxed to pay.

Since looking into the subject of war profits I have made some very interesting discoveries. I find that the United States Steel Corporation showed net earnings paid to its stockholders in 1913 of $81,216,985. That was the year before the war broke out in Europe. In 1917 the net profits of that concern had grown to $295,292,180.03 after having charged off $233,465,435 for Federal income and war excess-profits taxes. In 1913 the net profits of the E. I. du Pont Powder Co. were $4,582,075 and in 1916 they were $82,107,693, a gain of 2,000 per cent in three years. Armour & Co., the large Chicago packing company, had net profits of $6,028,197 in 1913. In 1916 their profits had increased to $20,100,000—over 300 per cent, which came largely out of the pockets of the stock raiser and the consumer. Swift & Co., another charitable institution, increased their earnings in the same period from $9,250,000 to $20,465,000, while the Cuban-American Sugar Co. reported net earnings of $356,887 in 1913 and $8,235,113 in 1916, a very sweet and juicy melon. These figures are not taken from Arabian Nights, but from the Business Digest of June 13, 1917.

I will ask to have inserted some very interesting statistics prepared by the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, at my request:

CORPORATION PROFITS IN UNITED STATES.

The following table of net profits of American industrial corporations is given in Printers' Ink.

Figures shown are the net profits earned for the stockholders, after deducting cost of materials, labor, depreciation, overhead, interest, and all other charges. All figures are official, having been taken from the companies' annual reports.

Gentlemen of the committee, you will observe that 19 corporations are listed in the second table, with net earnings of $544,753,083.84 for the year 1917. This is a fairly representative list.

I ask you, is it fair that we conscript our young manhood for the trenches, while the almighty dollar is placed upon a pedestal? Surely no one would plead the sanctity of wealth as compared to human lives. That is a doctrine to which the American people as a whole—certainly those whom I have the honor to represent—do not subscribe. They are willing to make every necessary sacrifice in blood and treasure, but they feel that the burden should be apportioned in accordance with one's means and war profits.

Since war was declared Congress has authorized the Government to take over the railroads and wire systems as a war measure. The necessary resolutions were passed with practical unanimity. Why not go a step further and take over the concerns manufacturing armament and munitions as a war measure, and thereby help take the profits out of this war? I would even go further by taking over the large packing plants for the duration of hostilities, thus helping to reduce the cost of living.

On the 9th of this month I introduced House joint resolution No. 328, which would authorize the President to take over the packing plants for the period of the war, allowing the stockholders a fair margin of profit. That should materially reduce the cost of living and insure a closer margin of profit between what the packers pay the stock raiser for live stock on hoof and the price paid by the consumer for the finished article.

Many of you gentlemen voted for constitutional prohibition as a war measure. Will anyone contend that taking over the packing and munition plants of the country would not also be a war necessity?

Why not take as much of the profit out of this war as possible? The boy who offers up his life does so without hope of material gain. Why should not those who remain at home prove themselves equally patriotic? Gentlemen, if we do not show a disposition to help lighten the load now weighing heavily upon the masses, the boys will do it upon their return from France. Let us not allow the pendulum to swing so far backward that it will inevitably swing to the other extreme later on.

Gentlemen of the committee, this war will probably cost the American people from forty to sixty billions of dollars before the treaty of peace is signed. In other words, from forty to sixty dollars per minute for the next 2,000 years, or $1 per minute for the next 80,000 years. We can safely assume that the interest on the bonds issued for war purposes will amount to one and one-half billions per annum. That is 50 per cent more than the total cost of operating the Government a few years ago. Add to that sum the amount needed for governmental operation after the war, with its huge insurance and compensation liability, and it is clear to be seen that the day of comparatively small taxes is a thing of the past in this country. From now on we must reconcile ourselves to a tax undreamed of a few years ago.

We must not load down future generations with a huge bonded indebtedness. They will have troubles enough of their own—and possibly wars, also. Let us impose taxes that will necessitate the issuance of the least possible in bonds, and, above all, place such taxation where it will work the least hardship and result in the least disarrangement and disturbance in our economic life.

In closing I would plead for a greater economy in the expenditure of the vast appropriations made by Congress for war purposes. Practically $640,000,000 has been squandered in our aircraft program. Then, too, there is the Hog Island scandal, the shoddy graft, and, had I the time, I could enumerate other cases of like nature. It is a significant fact that it has already cost this country much more than it should. England has an army twice as large as ours and a navy three times as large, but her military program is costing one-third less than our present expense, and I am credibly informed that it will cost twice as much the coming fiscal year.

The American people will gladly give every drop of blood and every dollar needed to carry on this war, for it is a battle in behalf of humanity; but they will object to inefficiency and worse, being in the saddle. They demand that men of experience be placed at the head of the various governmental activities rather than politicians whose sole qualification lies in substantial aid rendered the party. In the name of humanity, let politics be adjourned in deed as well as by word of mouth, and let us have a little of that "pitiless publicity" of which we heard so much six years ago and of which we have seen so very, very little. Let politics be truly adjourned. Let us proclaim to the world that we are a united people, whole-heartedly dedicated to the successful completion of the great task before us.

On the gory fields of France, where the boys of Minnesota and Alabama are fighting shoulder to shoulder and dying side by side, there is a unity of purpose that finds a spontaneous echo in every American heart. They have dedicated their lives to the cause of human freedom and individual rights; they are modern crusaders fighting in a holy cause. May the God of our fathers watch over and protect them; may He give to us wisdom and courage to back them up to the limit of our endurance and ability if necessary. Let us guard against an inconclusive peace and, above all, make this the last of all wars.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use the 20 minutes. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee I was greatly impressed with the illuminating discussion of the bill in the opening address of the chairman, in which he detailed the financial burdens that must come upon the country as a result of this tremendous war, making probably an annual outlay of from four to five billion dollars, which would be four or five times the expenditure of any year prior to the war. I note that the interest charge alone on our public debt in another year will be more than the entire expenditure of any year before the war. That is a thing that impressed me more in this legislation than anything else. With these problems will come others also. The reconstruction period when abnormal must give way to normal and new conditions met by sound legislation will call for wise oversight. One of the things that I have been most interested in as a student of the world war is the evolution of peace proposals which might be regarded as a systematic propaganda. If you will take all the peace proposals that have come from the central powers since the opening of the war it will be noticed that they come at certain periods always preceded by some great military effort, especially if a success. The first peace proposal of any consequence at all was on the 10th of August, 1914, and it was a pronunciamento by a group of professors of Germany. It outlined the purposes of pan-Germany and indicated what must be the result of the war. These claims were significantly ambitions. They extended over into France far enough to insure a military purpose of future control by securing rich resources of that country. I do not now recall the diplomatic language, but they meant we will have to finish with France and reduce her to a state of such incompetency as to offer us no further concern, and if you will notice the army went beyond the location of the mineral wealth of France, which occupied only one-fifth of the territory of France, but comprehended nine-tenths of her mineral wealth. Having reached the goal they dug in and at once began a peace propaganda. They did exactly the same thing with Belgium. That portion of such great strategic value being covered, the high command got ready to secure the future. That was in keeping with the suggestion of the college professors, professors of history and economy in the German universities. They did exactly the same thing with Russia. They said Russia was to be an outlet for the surplus population of Germany. The claim was made that Russia was so rich in territory that she will be able to pay an indemnity by giving lands. This statement of August, 1915, read in the light of what has since occurred, is most significant.

"Mittel Europa" was a dream, and if you take the various peace proposals since 1915 they can be outlined upon these great events: The first, the great drive of 1914, gave grounds for the first peace offensive; the second was the peace proposal emanating from Berlin, stimulated by the naval battle in the North Sea; the next proposals followed the overrunning of Serbia. Then the next movement toward peace was after the crushing of Roumania; the next one came after the prostration of Russia; and the last one was started in April of this year after the great drive of March; and finally the agitation in the midst of the fifth great drive, which was met by our wonderful counteroffensive since last July and which now sees our own boys taking the lead.

I have made a careful compilation of all of these peace proposals, including the answers of Asquith, Grey, Lloyd-George, Bonar Law, Balfour, and others, speaking for the British, and also the answers made by the French, by Italy, and the answers made by our own country through the President. I am surprised to find that there are so many, perhaps 100, documents, some very brief, others quite extensive, that express the efforts to secure peace, together with the answers which fully detail the reasons why no German peace is possible. One of the features that every Member would be interested in in studying the peace proposals, comparing the early ones with those we now read, is the change of spirit that is found in the suggestions coming from the central powers. The arrogance and haughty superiority so apparent in the beginning, which used the phraseology of "our iron will" and "our mailed fist" has all ceased, and now the language is softer and almost touches the plane of the suppliant if carefully scrutinized. Just a few days ago the statements of Dr. Solf, Prince Max, Count Czernin, and Count Burian were very mild, with the suggestion that the war ought to close, and a deep desire to find a way to save the face of German militarism, and an evident desire to open a way to convince the allies that they would close it at once without any negotiation. The statement of last July by Count Czernin, also the one by Von Kuehlman, bear an entirely different spirit from former utterances, which indicate that the will is broken.

I think that these peace proposals offer us a splendid opportunity to study the psychology of the German people as well as of the other people of the central powers. Also a splendid opportunity is supplied to indicate their conviction that the war is going against them. I know of no better way to pursue a progressive development of a national mind than a study of these documents. As a body of truth they ought to be put in permanent form for the sake of future students, to be used in our colleges and universities as interpretive sources to follow the propaganda elements and the course of the intellectuals in this the world's greatest crisis. I would like to have these documents by governmental authority and expense compiled and printed in a form in which they can be used later. They supply the original source for the study of the real cause and real purpose of the contest.

As an example, let me run over some of them. I wish simply here to enumerate some of them without giving contents, as that must be gleaned from context. The famous speech of Asquith, as the Premier called the "Guildhall speech," in November, 1914; Germany's conditions of peace, as announced by Dr. Bernhard Dernburg on April 17, 1915; allies conditions of peace, as announced by Sir Edward Grey in March, 1915; the suggestions of the problems of peace, as announced by our Secretary of State, then William Jennings Bryan, June 10, 11, 12, and 16, 1915; resolutions to enforce peace at Independence Hall, Philadelphia June 17 1915; Germanic terms by Count Andrassy, Minister of the Interior of Hungary, July, 1915; the Pope's plea for peace, August, 1915; Germany's peace terms as stated by the professors of history of Germany on August 10, to which I referred some moments ago; the basis of an enduring peace, announced by Col. Maude, of the British Army; Von Holweg's first official statement in the Reichstag, December 9, 1915, which was later on supplemented by the Reichstag speech of March, 1916; the probable terms announced by England; then the peace discussion in the Reichstag by Scheidemann, the leader of the socialists, Von Holweg, the chancellor, and Sandsberg, the deputy; and then the French announcement; the reply of Asquith to Von Holweg, April 10, 1916; President Poincaire's announcement at Nancy, May 14, 1916; Grey on peace conditions that England would demand, 1916; Italy's stand in 1916; Von Holweg in reply to Grey in the Reichstag, June 5, 1916; then the French view of July 14. 1916; and then the American view of May 27 by the President in the Flag Day address here in Washington, 1916.

All these bore on the same contention—the Teutons with the iron heel on the soil of their enemies demanding a German peace; the entente rejecting the surrender of liberty. Then the German National Committee's pronouncement; Germany's offer to Russia; England's position restated by Lloyd-George; Germany's position restated by Von Holweg; Von Holweg's reply; Germany's peace view expressed by Prof. Slugel; Germany's proposal, December 12, 1916, which is the famous Teuton peace offensive, the most specific that was up to that time proposed and which was communicated to the President here; Von Holweg's speech and text of the note; official comment on it by the French and English. The first reply, which was a rejection, was by Russia, the second by Italy, and then comes England's reply, first by George, then by Curzon, and then by Asquith; then came the President's peace note of December, 1916, which requested a restatement of war aims of the belligerents and which created much uneasiness in entente circles; the reply of the Teutons to the President's peace note came, for Germany on December 26, and on the same day from Austria. The reply of the entente was first made by the French on January 10, and then by Great Britain through Balfour, on January 13, and then for Belgium, on January 10, 1917, and then Germany's retort, on January 11, 1917. These documents from December 12, 1916, to January 11, 1917, supply valuable background for the study of German ambitions.

These are just suggestive of the character of the peace proposals as sources for the study of the world war from the standpoint of propaganda backed by the military power. They include the proposals that led to the peace of Brest-Litovsk; also the treaty itself. They will also include the Pope's appeal for peace, of August 16, 1917, which has a most interesting side light in its real effect upon German diplomacy. They will also include the pronunciamento of the socialists in Germany, which while professing antiwar impulses were ever loyal to the war party.

Then will come the statement of Michaelis, the chancellor who succeeded Von Holweg; the rejection of a peace proposal in the Commons introduced by Macdonald, the socialist; Czernin's reply to Lloyd George; Lloyd George on Germany's attitude in the war; Wilson's reply to the Pope of August 27, 1917; the Austrian view on this reply; the German view of August 21; the British official view of August 31; and then the American laborers' view on peace, of September 6. These various proposals always emanated with the central powers, now with Germany, then with Austro-Hungary. But it was constant talk of peace, with no intention save a German peace. As the English premier recently said, the "peace the wolf gave the geese." It has often been a subject of mystery how a nation supposed to be so well educated and so highly civilized as to claim a position of superiority could be guilty of such crimes of frightfulness and terrorism as those charged to Germany. It is easy to explain. When Germany had what she wanted, and her armies guarded the same, she set about in a systematic way to end the war from the map by terrorizing the world. She proceeded to frighten the world into surrender. For over five years the campaign of frightfulness has been carried on. In this as in her other efforts she has woefully blundered, at a cost she can never liquidate, hence the activity of her army to break the enemy, her frightfulness to end the war, and her peace proposals to gather up the spoils and plunder. Her army can not win. The allies will end the war, and the peace offensives will give way to a dictated peace on her own soil.

The central powers naturally and readily replied to the Pope; Germany on September 22, 1917, and Austria the same day, the opinion of the nations upon this last proposal was finally given; first, by Austria, as expressed by Von Seydler, September 25, 1917, and then by Germany, as expressed by Chancellor Michaelis, on September 28, 1917; and again by Von Kuehlman, expressing a German official opinion through the foreign secretary October 10, 1917. He then as secretary for foreign affairs had better success than he had since. It will be recalled that he recently made his last pronouncement, in which he declared Germany could not end the war on the military field, after which he was asked to resign. Then Lloyd George replied to Von Kuehlman on October 11, 1917; Asquith replied on the same date, and Count Czernin on October 3. Then the British, through Asquith, September 26; America, through President Wilson, on October 8; France, through Painleve, September 18; the Bolsheviki plan followed on November 10, Brazil's attitude on November 14, and the attitude of American labor November 12. Then the war aims were restated; first, by Austria, through Count Czernin; then by the British, through Lloyd George, January 5, 1918; then Italy, through Orlando, December 12, 1917; America, through President Wilson, January 8, 1918, and Germany, through Kaiser Wilhelm. Then followed Russia's downfall at Brest-Litovsk, the Russian disgrace, December 15, 1917; Russia's demand, December 22, 1917; Germany's demand, December 25, 1917; Russia's refusal, January 2, 1918; and Germany's rejoinder, January 10, 1918. Then follows the prostration of Russia, the assault on Roumania, and the consequent disgraceful treaty, and without limit the orgy of blood and anarchy continues to the present time. We have had four peace proposals hinted within the last four weeks, and while they appear to be a sort of Teutonic commiseration society they are all of an entirely different tone from what they were theretofore. No further evidence is needed to demonstrate a frantic desire to quit, but, if possible, to save the face of autocracy.

Now, fellow Members, I think that probably the most serious problem that faces America is the peace possibility, for I look for Germany, when the handwriting on the wall becomes so glaring and she knows that her own people can no longer be lulled into a sense of security, but will behold a rude and awakening reality when she sees the entente and American armies going over her soil, in order to save herself from an internal revolution to throw herself upon the mercy of the world. Our people, as a rule, are free from cruelty, and my fear is—and I hope this will not be misconstrued—my fear is that we, in our desire to end this awful war, might in our heart of hearts be willing to accept conditions which would not reduce the dangerous power of that tremendous autocracy, so that we might have trouble in the future by simply deferring the time for another war. The danger lurks in our horror for war and in a situation where the kindness of the American heart may demand a cessation of hostilities, in what would be looked upon as the call of humanity, before we have placed the enemy in a condition where he can not renew this war.

I say it without any reflection on anybody, but I say it as a possibility that ought to be looked into pretty carefully in the light of the tremendous movement of our armies to-day, which brings the enemy one day nearer to total and complete collapse if we but see our duty to the world. My judgment is that Germany, as expressed by Count Burian, also by Count Czernin and also by von Kuehlman within the last four weeks, is ready and quite willing if the way opens to give up Belgium and France. But, of course, the Jugo-Slav and Czecho-Slovaks must be composed some way, which presents a problem. Germany wants to hold Russia to recoup herself for the loss on the west. Our reply should be greater aggression on the front. We must not stop this war until Germany takes her heel off the liberties of the world, wherever it is. Any other peace would be inconclusive and a waste of blood and treasure. That, in my judgment, is a serious problem confronting us to-day. Some day in the near future I shall ask the House to print in document from the compilation of these peace proposals which I now have ready. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the first section of the bill. Then I shall move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I.—GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 1. That when used in this act—

The term "person" includes partnerships, corporations, and associations as well as individuals;

The term "corporation" includes associations, joint-stock companies, and insurance companies, as well as private corporations;

The term "domestic" when applied to a corporation or partnership means created or organized in the United States;

The term "foreign" when applied to a corporation or partnership means created or organized outside the United States;

The term "United States" when used in a geographical sense includes only the States, the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and the District of Columbia;

The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Treasury;

The term "commissioner" means the Commissioner of Internal Revenue;

The term "collector" means collector of internal revenue;

The term "revenue act of 1916" means the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916;

The term "revenue act of 1917" means the act entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917;

The term "taxpayer" includes any person, trust, or estate subject to a tax imposed by this act;

The term "Government contract" means (a) a contract made with the United States, or with any department, bureau, officer, commission, board, or agency, under the United States and acting in its behalf, or with any agency controlled by any of the above if the contract is for the benefit of the United States, or (b) a subcontract made with a contractor performing such a contract if the products or services to be furnished under the subcontract are for the benefit of the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to gentlemen that while we have read that section, if on Monday, or when we begin the reading of the bill again any one desires to offer an amendment to any one of the paragraphs of that section there will be no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KITCHIN. I do.
Mr. WALSH. Is it the intention to read the bill by paragraphs?
Mr. KITCHIN. By paragraphs. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PURNELL, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. SANDERS of Indiana), was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR MONDAY AND CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order on the Unanimous Consent Calendar on Monday.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with Unanimous Consent Calendar business on Monday. Does the gentleman include suspension of the rules?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the business in order on Monday.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order on next Monday.
Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention to proceed now and finish the bill before any other business?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.
Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order on Monday.
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.
Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest that the gentleman also ask for the dispensing with business in order on Calendar Wednesday.
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I will make that request.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina also asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order on Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?
Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not couple with his request to dispense with business in order on Monday the request to postpone for the following Monday.
The SPEAKER. The way the Chair put it was to dispense with it next Monday and on next Wednesday. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, September 16, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Attorney General, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required by the Department of Justice for the current fiscal year (H. Doc. 1276); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for the current fiscal year required by the Division of Loans and Currency and the Register of the Treasury (H. Doc. No. 1277); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1278); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII,
Mr. WASON introduced a bill (H. R. 12944) granting an increase of pension to Gilman P. Huff, which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ELSTON: Additional petitions, containing many hundred signatures, submitted by the Northern California Branch of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, appealing for American interest and aid in behalf of suffering Armenians in the Russian Caucasus; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolution of the National Fraternal Congress of America, favoring the passage of Senate bill 3475; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petition of the Daniel Miller Co., of Baltimore, Md., concerning the matter of inventories with respect to future adjustments; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RAKER: Resolution of the Common Council of the city of San Diego, Cal., relative to the United States service hospital conducted there by the Talent Workers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the Ripin Co., of New York City, against the shipment of wine into this country from Italy; to the Committee on Agriculture.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 16, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, draw near to us with Thy holy influence, that we may be guided, in the test through which we are passing, to victory, for the eternal values—life, liberty, truth, justice, righteousness—and the battle ne'er give o'er until a permanent peace shall be established in all the world.

We thank Thee that the Congress of the United States and the people which it represents are placing at the disposal of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy means and men to further the war, with our allies, to the desired end.

Continue to inspire us by the signal victories of our arms. Especially do we thank Thee for the glories won by the American soldiers.

Continue to uphold, sustain, and guide them, with their allies, until the enemies of civilization shall be subjected to the peace proposition of the civilized world. And the glory shall be Thine in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 14, 1918, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FLOOD indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12863.
The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH), there were—ayes 35, noes none.
The SPEAKER. In the temporary absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will take the chair.
Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The first paragraph is now subject to amendment. If there are no amendments, the clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

BASIS FOR DETERMINING GAIN OR LOSS.

SEC. 201. That for the purpose of ascertaining the gain derived or loss sustained from the sale or other disposition of property, real, personal, or mixed, the basis shall be—
(a) In the case of property acquired before March 1, 1913, the fair market price or value of such property as of that date; and
(b) In the case of property acquired on or after that date, (1) the cost thereof; or (2) the inventory value, if the inventory is made in accordance with section 202.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 202 be passed over for amendment. It is my intention later to offer an amendment to it. I ask that it be passed over, to be returned to at the pleasure of the committee.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to offer an amendment to section 201. I do not wish to lose my right to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will not lose any rights. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio that section 202 be passed over, to be taken up hereafter at the pleasure of the committee?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to section 201, and I ask permission to proceed for 10 minutes. I may not use all that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes in connection with his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. May we have the amendment reported?

Mr. HARDY. My motion is to strike out section 201.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HARDY: Page 4, beginning at line 20, strike out all of section 201.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 201, which makes income out of the difference between what a man sells his property for and what it was worth in March, 1913, if he bought it before then, or what he paid for it if he bought it after that date. I do so because section 201 is absolutely inequitable. The profits that are purposed to be taxed in the general schedule of this bill are the profits for the year 1918. We all know that hundreds of thousands of transactions have occurred between 1913 and 1918, based upon the value of the dollar when the transaction occurred. In simple principle and policy, a piece of property bought in 1913, if its exchange value to-day is to be equal to its exchange value when it was bought, must bring in dollars and cents something like two times what it cost. That is so along all the schedules of buying and selling. I heard some one the other day make the suggestion that if you made a sales tax you would have to keep a schedule of all sales, and that that would be impossible. If you comply with section 201 you will have to keep a schedule of every sale of personal, real, or mixed property that you make, because your income is by section 201 declared to be the difference between what you paid and what you sell it for if you bought it since March, 1913, or the difference between what it was worth in March, 1913, and what you sell it for if you bought it before that, and that takes every sale that a man makes. If complied with, section 201 will require that every seller of personal or other property should keep a schedule of what he paid for that property if he bought it after 1913, or an estimate of what it was worth in 1913 if he bought it before that. It is urged, and I understand that it is true, that some similar principle has been embodied in other revenue measures. That does not affect its justice or soundness. I am appealing to the committee not to adopt the principle of this section now, because it will cause a stagnation in all trade and there will be infinite difficulty in the enforcement of it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman heard of any stagnation or anything of that kind under the present statute?

Mr. HARDY. The present statute is nothing like the statute about to be enacted.

Mr. GARNER. This is merely enacting into law the rules and regulations now in force under the present statute.

Mr. HARDY. So far as the present rules and regulations are concerned, they have not cut the figure that this will. You take a man who has done a great deal of trading, who bought his property years ago and now is in the habit of making trades, whether it be in the buying and selling of ships or the buying and selling of land, that man to-day makes a sale of a tract of land which he bought in 1913 at the prices then prevailing, and if he sold it to-day at 100 per cent apparent profit and reinvested the money he could not obtain any more property now than he could have obtained in 1913 with the money then paid for the same land.

And yet he is taxed under this bill for alleged profits accruing from his sale. If you want to tax the unearned increment, all right; that would be just, and you could tax all such increments equally. There is reason and equity, if a man has a large increment, such as increased rental value of his property, if you tax the increment in value. That is all right, because it can be fully adjusted all over the country and made to bear equally on all taxpayers. But under section 201 here are two men owning tracts of land side by side and the unearned increment is equal. One sells and he pays a large tax because he sells for 100 per cent over what he gave for it. The other man's property has increased equally in value, but he does not sell and he pays no tax. That is not a tax on income, but a tax in restraint of trade. Here are the two men owning different tracts of land of equal value, bought in 1913; each paid $50 an acre, and now it is worth $100 an acre. One would exchange for the other, perhaps. I do not know whether there would be any tax on the exchange, but if there is a tax on the exchange, although the tracts are of the same market value of $100, they could not exchange places without each of them paying a heavy tax. Neither of them would make any real profit, but each of them would pay a tax, because they had received for their lands property worth more to-day in dollars than the price they had paid for their lands in 1914. For purposes personal to them one wants the farm of the other, so they exchange. I do not know whether that trade would be taxable under this law or not, if they simply recited that one tract of land is given in exchange for the other. This tract of land is worth $100 on the market to-day and that is worth $100 on the market to-day. They cost only $50 an acre in 1913. If they exchange and pass deeds each man is receiving the equivalent of a hundred dollars per acre. The chairman of the committee tells me there would be no tax on such an exchange, but I do not know what the ruling may be. This tax is unequal in another line. If the income of one of these men outside of the difference in price paid and the price received for his land is $100,000 and his income be increased by this alleged profit from the sale, he would have to pay as taxes something like 70 per cent of the alleged profit, while if the other man had no other income his tax on the very same sale would be very small.

I say that the provisions of this section are inequitable and unfair and unequal, so that it ought not to stand in the bill.

Now, let me make this suggestion to the committee in charge of this bill. If they want to put on a sales tax, why not do it as they do the stamp provision? There they provide for every sale of real estate—I believe it is only applicable to real estate—the deed of conveyance shall have a stamp tax of 50 cents for each $500. I would rather see this section go out and make the tax on each sale $5 for every $500. If you did that a man would know when he made a sale how much the Government was going to get and how much he was going to get. He would know how much he would have to pay in taxes. This section ought to be wiped from the bill, and if you are proposing to tax the act of selling, tax it as such under the stamp tax and make every man who sells a tract of land pay 1 per cent tax on the consideration received when he sells it, or such per cent as may be required to raise the needed revenue.

I do not know what other laws have said, I do not know what other governments have done, but I do know that this section is full of inequities and the definition ought not to be there, because it recites what is not true.

The profits of an individual selling a tract of land in 1918 is not the difference between what he gave for it in 1914 and what he sells it for now. He has no profit, if the money he receives to-day would buy no more than the money he gave would have bought in 1914.

It is unequal because it allows a man who retains the property on which the unearned increment is accrued to pay no taxes, and will induce thousands of men to simply stop trading or buying and selling. If you want to cause a stagnation of dealings in land you put that tax there.

Let us study this section. Here is a man who wants to buy a home, wants to buy 100 acres of land, and the man that owns it must, without making this sale, return a considerable income, and if he makes the sale, the difference between what he paid for it and what he gets will be added to his income and taxed very heavily. If his income outside of that is $50,000 and the profit as fixed by this section increases it by $10,000, that $10,000 would pay two or three thousand dollars of tax. What is he going to do? If he sells it, he is going to add that to the purchase price of the little man who wants to buy a home. Suppose his income over and above that is $100,000. My recollection is that he would then have to pay on that supposed profit of $10,000 some $4,000 or $5,000 as a Government tax. Is he going to bear that, or will he make it harder for the little man who wants to buy by making him pay part of the tax? The Government unjustly calls the price A receives from selling his property an income, and A, if possible, adds the tax to the selling price of his land.

Mr. GARNER. If a man bought a piece of land in 1915 for $10,000 and sold it in 1918 for $20,000, then I understand the gentleman to argue that he has made no profit, because $20,000 now is not worth as much as $10,000 then.

Mr. HARDY. That is one proposition, one ground of my objection to this tax.

Mr. GARNER. Would that not apply to the purchase of cattle, the purchase of oil, the purchase of steel, or the purchase of anything else in 1915, which was sold in 1918, so that there would be absolutely no such thing as profit in 1918 unless the money should be just as valuable in 1915?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in order to reply to that argument.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. The fact that a principle applies to other things than that which I have named does not make it any the less just. If you are taxing unearned increment for 1918, tax that, and do not go back with a retroactive act for five or six years. It is now five years since March, 1913, and 1919 will add the unearned increment of six years, and it will take from the decreasing purchasing power of the dollar. I do not care whether it be cattle or steel or iron or any other kind of property. The increased value that accrued in 1914 is not a part of the income of 1918, because it accrued in 1914, and no increased price which is merely the result of a fall in the value of the dollar is a profit, and to tax the increased price growing through five years of universally rising prices simply because the property is sold or exchanged is unjust. The law is unjust as applied to every commodity, and it applies to personal, real, and mixed property. I simply make the statement that if you want to tax the unearned increment you should tax it whether the property is sold or not. That is just, and you can apportion the unearned increment of each year. If that property has increased in value 100 per cent in five years, you can apportion 20 per cent of it for the year in which the sale is made and the income given, or if you wish to tax unearned increments, tax them by legislation that will reach and get the unearned increment in the hands of the man who holds his land or the man who sells it alike. However, if you wish to put an embargo on the opportunity of a poor man buying land, you will do it by this section to a large extent, in my judgment. If you were just and fair in this, I would say all right, but you are not just; you are unequal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HARDY. I shall not ask to say anything more. In my opinion, this section defines as profits something that is not profits and as income something that is not income. A sale or exchange of property is merely a conversion of one kind of property into another.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, either the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] does not understand the provision in section 201 and in section 213, or else the committee does not understand it, and neither did the Congress understand it in 1913 nor did the Congress understand it in 1916. This provision makes absolutely no change in existing law. It was the same in the acts of 1913 and 1916. No man on this floor or on the floor of the Senate made any objections to it upon the ground the gentleman makes objections now. In the consideration of the act of 1913 and the act of September 8, 1916, no man on the floor or on the floor of the Senate made the objections now made by the gentleman from Texas. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] suggested, the reasoning of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] would apply to every conceivable source of income. I would also say to the gentleman that you might strike out the provision which he asks us to strike out, and it would not affect the law at all. Gross income is defined in section 213.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think that the reason that there has not been more complaint about this particular method is on account of the fact that the normal income tax has been a low tax, but as occasion arises for this scale ascending, if you go and accumulate six or seven years of unearned increment and then apply the heavy tax to the one year, it would be very onerous?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I suppose objections will be raised to a great many provisions in the bill, because the tax is high, but the principle is the same, whether the tax is 2, 4, or 12 per cent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Let me suggest this to the gentleman from Texas: Suppose you had applied this law to each income for each year in five, and then let us say that the war is over, and in five years from now we have a low, normal tax, and a man comes in and says, "I want you to take it all for this year and not to go back to 1918 and apportion it at 12 per cent."

Mr. BLACK. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: Would it not be well to have the law provide in the case of property acquired before March 1, 1913, "the fair market price or value of such property as of the date of the beginning of the fiscal or calendar year for which the taxpayer makes his returns"?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman's proposition could be maintained, then we would have a ridiculous performance on the part of the Treasury Department. Suppose I bought a piece of property five years ago and I sell at a big profit now. It would have to go to work and ascertain the value of that piece of property on the 1st of January last year, the 1st of January the year before, the 1st of January the year before that, the 1st of January the year before that, and on the 1st of January the year before that, when there is possibly no way of finding out. The gain for income-tax purposes can not be determined until the property is sold.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Does not this very bill require, in case property was bought before 1913, they must go to work and find out the value as of that date——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The date of March 1, 1913. What more difficulty would you have in finding out the value of the property the first of the current year than of March 1, 1913?

Mr. KITCHIN. You would have five times more difficulty if you had to ascertain it for five years, or six times if you had to do it for six years.

Mr. HARDY. You would have less difficulty, because you would only have to find the value of property at a comparatively recent date.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is very good reason. I assumed every gentleman in the House, I thought even the gentleman from Texas, understood why we had to put March 1, 1913, into the statute, because before March 1, 1913, Congress had no constitutional power to levy an income tax. The income-tax amendment did not become effective until March 1, 1913. All gain, to which the gentleman referred, which had accrued before Congress had the power to pass an income tax could not be taxed, and therefore we had to say that in the case of property purchased before March 1, 1913, it matters not what its value, must be taken as of that date, because if I bought a piece of property of $10,000 and on March 1, 1913, it was worth $20,000, my income or profit is $10,000, and as that gain accrued before Congress had the power to enact an income tax, it could not be taxed.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that this income law and this excess-profits tax law is designed to tax incomes for the calendar year and the fiscal year? That is the primary purpose, is it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. As this section stands is it not possible to tax an income extending over a period of five years?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir; let me call this to the gentleman's attention: The Constitution gives us power to tax incomes from whatever source derived. A gain, whether over a period of one, two, three, or five years, can not be determined for income-tax purposes until a sale is made.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not yield to the gentleman now. I am a lawyer, and say I had a case on hand which I had had for 10 years and I had been working on that case every year. I was earning a part of my fee each year, but what is my income? The amount they pay me, that is the income from my efforts extending over several years. So my income is taxable the year I receive it, the year I enjoy it, it is when it is an enjoyable income.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield.

Mr. HARDY. Suppose that man instead of holding the property in 1913, if he had only bought in 1915, and had paid half the difference between 1913–1918, he still has the same property, but pays less tax. Is there any equity——

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is any equity in an income tax. It makes no difference whether it is land you buy or a ship. If you bought a ship in 1916 for $100,000 and sell it in 1918 at $200,000, or if you bought Bethlehem stock or United States Steel Corporation stock in 1915, your income is the difference between the purchase and selling price, and that is the only rule under which you can administer the law.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In the case of the lawyer which the gentleman cited, suppose you were employed in that case in 1913 and it goes dragging through the courts until 1918, a very important case, in which you were to receive $10,000, and you required your client to pay you $2,000 each year, and in the year 1918 you received $2,000, how much income tax would you pay?

Mr. KITCHIN. In 1918 you would be taxed upon the $2,000 received during that year.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask permission to modify my amendment so that it can be discussed as modified.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is it not a fact that the trouble which the gentleman has pointed out in reference to investment is due entirely to the decrease in the purchasing value of the dollar, whether that is not the underlying scheme?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is one proposition. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] would apply to every income, and I will say that, in my opinion, if the theory of the gentleman was carried throughout this law that we would get from the war and excess-profits tax and the income tax $2,000,000,000 less than we expect to get under the proposed bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If I understand the gentleman the income tax is collected on the income as it is paid and not as it is earned?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not as it is earned.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. For instance, if a man earns his fee in 1915 and it is collected in 1918, the present law would govern?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; unless he kept his books on an accrual basis.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. In the case of loss, is the seller permitted to deduct that loss?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that a person selling land has a right to add his permanent improvements as a part of the capital invested and deduct it from his increased income.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman said that he would pay a tax on the income the year he made it. If a payment of $1,000 a year was agreed on for five years, and there had been none of it collected until 1918, does the gentleman think that that would come in as income for 1918 or that the payment of a note that was due for services in 1914 and not paid until 1918 would be 1918 income?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. If you paid a note——

Mr. HARDY. Suppose it was not a note but just an agreement to pay?

Mr. KITCHIN. If I was a lawyer and in 1915 took a $5,000 note for a fee and did not collect that note until 1918, the gentleman wants to know if I would be taxed in 1918 or 1915. If I was honest I would have given it in 1915, because that was income for that year. I could have enjoyed it by selling the note or discounting it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Putting the reverse of the question asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], suppose a man bought property at a certain date in 1913 and sold that in 1918 at a loss, does this law provide that he shall be permitted to take credit for the entire loss or only a certain percentage of the loss, based on the number of years over which it existed?

Mr. KITCHIN. It answers itself.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not answer itself.

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean if it is prorated like the gentleman says?

Mr. MADDEN. What I mean is, that if he buys property in March, 1913, and sells it at a profit in 1918, of course he must pay the Government a tax on the difference between the purchase price and the selling price, but if he buys property in 1913 and sells it at a loss in 1918, the question is, Does the law permit him to take credit for the loss? I do not think it does.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think he can under the provision in the bill allowing a deduction of all losses, whether connected with the business or not.

Mr. MADDEN. Under this law, but it can not be deducted under existing law.

Mr. KITCHIN. Any loss in connection with the trade or business can be deducted under existing law, but in an isolated transaction, not connected with the trade or business, only losses sustained not to exceed the profits arising therefrom can be deducted under existing law. The proposed bill provides for the deduction of the entire loss in such a case.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment by, instead of striking out section 201 as an entirety, striking out all after the brackets and down to and including "1913," in line 25, and, after the word "date," insert "of the beginning of the year in which the sale is made," so that it will read as a whole:

The fair market price or value of such property as of the date of the beginning of the year in which the sale is made.

So it will get the increment for that year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and offer in lieu thereof another one, which the Clerk will report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HARDY: Page 4, line 24, after "(a)," strike out the words "in the case of property acquired before March 1, 1913," and after the word "date," in line 26, insert the words "of the beginning of the year in which the sale is made."

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a minute. He would also want to change the word "that," before "date," to "the," I think.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; that is right.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, now I ask unanimous consent that we take a vote on that when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who desires to address the committee, has concluded.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have the amendment read now as amended. I have just come in.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 24, page 4:
"(a) The fair market price or value of such property as of the date of the beginning of the year in which the sale is made; and."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment end with the termination of the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would not take up the time of the House in discussing this amendment were it not for the fact that in my opinion it is one of the most important paragraphs in the bill.

Existing law permits a person or a corporation owning property purchased prior to March 1, 1913, to take its value as of that date—March 1, 1913—when disposing of the property. Now, the reason why that date has been fixed is because at that time the courts held the income-tax law constitutional. Property purchased prior to March 1, 1913, and sold this year is treated by the Treasury Department as follows: Suppose that you purchased a piece of property 10 years ago and sell it to-day. You have held possession of that property for 10 years. The difference between the price paid for it 10 years ago and the price you sell it for to-day, including the original purchase price, is the amount of your taxes and your upkeep, whatever that may be. What you sell the property for above these costs is profit, and on that profit you must pay a tax; but prorating your earnings on the profit from that property obtained when you sold it from the time you purchased it to the time you sell it, you pay a tax upon what it earned pro rata from March 1, 1913, down to date of sale; but what it earned prior to March 1, 1913, is not subject to taxes under existing law or under the provisions of this bill. This language in this bill, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr KITCHIN] has said, is exactly the language contained in the act of September 8, 1916, and in the act of October 3, 1917. There is no change in this as compared with existing law. The property purchased since March 1, 1913, and converted into money or profit this year is considered income of this year, and one must pay an income tax on that income. But, as before stated, whatever the property earned prior to March 1, 1913, is not subject to an income tax.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. If A and B, owning two tracts of land, exchange those tracts without any money being paid, although each one of them has enhanced in value, is there any tax on that exchange?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. They have received nothing. They have had no income. You do not have an income until you convert the property into money. I may own a piece of land and exchange with you for another piece of land to-day worth twice what the property cost me when I gave it to you, but there is no income, because I have not converted it into money.

Mr. HARDY. Let me put it this way: If A sells his tract of land for $100 an acre and buys B's tract of land at $100 an acre there are two income taxes to pay, are there not?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. If you make a profit, then you must pay a tax; but if you do not make a profit you do not pay a tax.

Mr. HARDY. Then I made as much profit if you exchanged the land as if two sales were made and two purchases.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; unless you convert your property into money or stock of a corporation, you have no income. If you have an income, you pay the tax.

Mr. HARDY. Is nothing else but property considered an income?

Mr. FORDNEY. I know of no such sale. I have never converted property into anything except money or the stock of a corporation.

Mr. HARDY. Does not this bill put a tax on property?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not unless it is converted into money.

Mr. HARDY. If you trade for personal property, you do not pay tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you convert your property into stock, which is equivalent to money, you must pay a tax on it, but no other way.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Referring to the proposition of the cost of the property, suppose in 1913 a man buys a piece of land and pays $1,000 for it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; after March 1.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Yes; after March 1. Another man buys a piece of land and pays $5,000 for it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. In the meantime, if to-day this law goes into effect, the man who has the $5,000 land finds that his land has not increased in value, but the man who has the $1,000 land finds his has increased in value fivefold and that it is now worth $5,000, and they exchange. Does the $1,000 man not pay an income tax on that exchange?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe I am right in saying that you pay no tax on any value you may get by exchange of property unless you convert it into money or its equivalent, which is stock or bonds, which this law provides shall be considered as income. Unless you convert property into money or money equivalent, you do not pay a tax upon it. If you purchased a piece of property for $1,000 on March 1, 1913, and convert it into money to-day or its equivalent at $10,000, you are called upon to pay a tax on $9,000. If I purchased a piece of property then at $5,000 and convert it into money at $10,000 to-day, I pay a tax on whatever my profit is and you pay a tax on your profit. If you made more profit than I did, you must pay more tax than I do. That is all.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Under the bill, if the $1,000 man makes $4,000 profit by taking a $5,000 property in exchange instead of $5,000 cash, he pays no tax under this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. He does not pay any tax unless he gets an income. I can not answer any clearer than that. An exchange of property is not an income, in my opinion.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield. But do not take up all my time.

Mr. HARDY. Suppose a case where land is sold and payment made in cattle.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you convert the cattle into income, then you have an income, and you pay a tax on that income. You do not get any income on your cattle until they are converted into money. Suppose you have cattle in your possession and feed them all this year. You have no income from them. I say you pay no tax on an exchange of property unless you convert that property into money or its equivalent, and then you pay an income tax. Only then do you pay a tax on it. This law imposes no tax on real estate—only a tax on incomes.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman does not regard payment in cattle as an income at all?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. How can you use the cattle until you can sell them?

Mr. HARDY. You may have them for dairy purposes.

Mr. FORDNEY. You may keep them for 10 years, and yet you have no income until you convert those cattle into money.

Mr. HARDY. And yet a man may buy out a whole dairy as an investment for the benefit of his business.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no man is so blind as the man who will not see. This law provides only for a tax upon your income. If you have no income, you do not pay a tax.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Suppose a man had a tract of land that was worth $25 an acre prior to March 1, 1913——

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; worth $25 an acre prior to March 1, 1913.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Which increases in value a dollar every year for five years, and is now worth $30 an acre.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Now, what income tax would a man have to pay under the present law, and what would he have to pay under any other laws?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you purchased a piece of property before March 1, 1913, you can take the value on that date as your investment in that property, and whatever you sell that property for over and above that value is income, on which you must pay the tax. Now, if you purchased it after March 1, 1913, there is no question as to its value. Its value is what you paid for it, and when you sell it this year the difference between what you paid for it and what you get for it is profit, and on that you pay an income tax. That is the law. I can not make it any plainer than that.

Mr. KNUTSON. Now, we will say that three individuals own a certain piece of property together which they bought subsequent to March 1, 1913, and the increase is divided proportionately among the three. How would the tax be levied in that case?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, my friend, I have said before that you do not pay the tax until you get the income. Whatever your income is on that you must pay the tax, no matter how you dispose of your property.

Mr. WINSLOW. Let us suppose that a trust fund has been created for $100,000 and invested in real estate.

Mr. FORDNEY. When?

Mr. WINSLOW. At any time—within the time provided in this bill or at any other time. In due time that property is sold for $125,000. Would the $25,000 be regarded as income or would it be added to the principal of the trust account?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you have purchased a piece of property since March 1, 1913, for $100,000 and you sell it to-day for $125,000, under existing law and under the provisions of this bill your profit is $25,000, and on that you pay an income tax.

Mr. WINSLOW. Your profit?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Then do you make a distinction in the bill between what is commonly known as profit and what is commonly known as income? There is a very distinct difference.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not think there is any difference when you apply it to a purchase since March 1, 1913. Whatever you dispose of your property for in dollars and cents over and above what it cost you since March 1, 1913, is profit or income of this year. You make that profit this year. If you dispose of that property this year and obtain that profit this year, it is income of this year according to law, and on that you must pay the tax.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. What is the difference between net income and profit, if any?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNYDER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you bought a piece of property five years ago for $100,000, and you sell it to day for $25,000 more than you paid for it your profit over and above the purchase price is $25,000, and you have a profit of $25,000. Now, you may charge up against that $25,000 profit the taxes which you have paid on that property from the time you purchased it until the time you sold it, or you may be permitted to charge up insurance, or you may charge up any other expenses which you have been put to in maintaining or looking after that property, and your net profit is the difference between all those costs and the price you obtained for it.

Mr. WINSLOW. Let us take the case of $100,000 invested in a trust fund, the investment to be made in real estate which, within the terms of this bill, is duly sold for $125,000. The profit on the sale is $25,000. Now, suppose in the meanwhile it has earned, in rentals, and so forth, after paying the taxes, an income of $10,000 a year. Do you differentiate at all between the $25,000 which is made as a profit on the sale and the $10,000 which is the net income derived from handling the property?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. The difference between the purchase price and the sale price, together with all income from that property during the time you held it, is considered profit or income. Deduct from the sale price the purchase price and the cost of maintenance and looking after the property, collecting rents, and all other proper charges. Deduct that from the profits you made out of the property, and the net profit on the sale, together with the income from rentals or any other source during the year is your profit, and on that profit you pay a tax. That is your income for this year, if you obtained the profit this year.

Mr. WINSLOW. One further inquiry, please.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Suppose you are one of three trustees of a property of $100,000 invested in real estate, and in the course of two years you have a chance to sell that real estate and do sell it for a profit of $25,000. Do you think that as a trustee you would be willing to distribute that $25,000 among the beneficiaries of the trust as a matter of income?

Mr. FORDNEY. If it is income it is the duty of the trustee to distribute it or pay the taxes due.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. FORDNEY. If not, he retains it in the business.

Mr. WINSLOW. There is a difference between profit and income.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no, my good friend. You get back to the proposition of a corporation. What is the difference between a corporation obtaining profit out of a business and a trustee obtaining profit?

Mr. WINSLOW. The trustee obtains the profit in the interest of the real owner.

Mr. FORDNEY. The law provides that a corporation failing to distribute those profits for this year to the stockholders pays in addition to the 12 per cent normal tax a penalty of 6 per cent, making a total of 18 per cent for nondistributed earnings of this year. I do not know as that applies to a trustee the same as to a corporation.

Mr. WINSLOW. One further question, Should the Members of the House understand that for the purposes of this bill all increases, whether profits, technically speaking, or income, technically speaking, become the subject of taxation on the same basis?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. So you make a pool of the whole business in the way of increase, income, and profits?

Mr. FORDNEY. All profits obtained in this year's business, whether from the sale of property or profits made out of the manufacture and sale of goods, is income of this year and subject to taxation under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest this as an illustration? If I have a share of stock that brings me in a certain income, that is properly income and taxable as such. If I sell that stock and make a profit, it is not strictly income but regarded as income and taxed.

Mr. WINSLOW. If you are defending the interests of the beneficiaries under a trust, you would not feel that you should dissipate the profit on the sale.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think not. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for half a minute.

Mr. HARDY. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes myself. I offered the amendment, and there has been 15 minutes discussion against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute, and the gentleman from Texas couples with that a request for five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. I withdraw any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina how much revenue, in his opinion, would be lost in case the amendment of the gentleman from Texas was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under his theory I should guess $2,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think that the gentleman from Texas ought to suggest something to take the place of it?

Mr. GARNER. I do not think you could get over three billion from excess profits and income.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think that the gentleman from Texas ought to offer some suggestion to take the place of that loss?

Mr. KITCHIN. In the loss of sales and profits I should say that we would lose more than half of the tax from the profit sales.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is perfectly frank that this amendment of mine would sacrifice $2,000,000 revenue, I have no further contention, because necessity knows no law.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman that the theory of his proposed amendment would undoubtedly cut the revenue down 50 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I have suggested a straight tax on sales. I would make it apply to all sales of $500 and over. Put on a stamp tax of 1 per cent or over. I do not believe you would lose a dollar of revenue if you did that.

Now I want to say a word in reply to what the gentleman from Michigan said, that the sale of land by exchange for other property actually pays no tax. Suppose the gentleman wants to get a dairy stock and he knows the market value of Holstein cows out at the Soldiers' Home—that cows, fine cows, are worth $200 a head. He finds a man with a fine herd of Holstein cows and he trades his land for the cows. He does not get money, but he gets what would cost him money to buy. I am afraid that you will find that under this bill, standing as it does, there will be more ingenious devices to avoid the payment of the income tax than ever were invented to avoid any other tax because inherently wrong. The gentleman made the statement that in arriving at the profits he would take into the calculation of all the expenses for five years, deducting them together with the original purchase price from the selling price. This seems to me to show that you are levying a tax to cover the profits of five years on men who sell, while everybody else is only levied upon for the profits of one year. It is unjust, it is unequal, and will be difficult of enforcement because men will adopt hundreds of methods of evasion.

If you want a tax on the increased value of 1918, you can find what the value was at the beginning of the year as well as you can find what the value was in 1913. The very obstacle that the gentleman from North Carolina insists would make it difficult to enforce such a law stands in the way of enforcing section 201. It is as difficult to find out the value in 1913 as in 1918. You have got to find under section 201 what the value was in 1913; can you not find the value at the beginning of the taxable year more easily than you can find what it was four or five years ago?

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman's theory was put into law, every corporation in the country paying an income tax would be permitted to take from their profit deductions based on the value to-day instead of March 1, 1913, and your income to the Treasury Department would be far less than what it would be under this bill.

Mr. HARDY. Corporations are not engaged in selling the corpus of the corporation. This does not affect them, or affects them but little; it affects the private individual.

Mr. FORDNEY. A corporation has the benefit of an 8 or 10 per cent deduction based on the capital in making the income tax for this year. If permitted to take the value of their property this year instead of under the law, the original purchase price—there is a vast difference between the purchase price to-day and——

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman mean under this law a man having goods on his shelves is to go back and see what the value was when he got them?

Mr. FORDNEY. His books will show what the value was in 1913.

Mr. GARNER. Let me say to the gentleman, take the corporation that is earning 50 per cent. If you take that as a basis of value, there would be no excess profits in this bill at all.

Mr. HARDY. This is not a question of excess profits.

Mr. GARNER. But it is the same theory that you are speaking of—taking the basis of value as of the 1st day of January of the calendar year for which you collect the taxes. Then a corporation or an individual would be worth whatever the property was worth on the 1st day of January, and you would base the calculation upon that.

Mr. HARDY. If he sells out, you would do it; but there is no analogy in the proposition the gentleman makes and the question I am discussing. In effect section 201 makes this bill levy a sales tax, and a sales tax that is so unequal as to make it a travesty on the idea of fair and equal treatment, much less equal and uniform taxation. I do not object to a sales tax, but let it be uniform and equal. I do not object to a tax on unearned increment, but let that also be universal and equal. I do object to an embargo on trade and the taxing of profits and incomes which do not exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest an alteration in paragraph (a) of section 201. The amendment would be to add in line 26, after the word "date," the words "plus taxes thereon and interest on the investment paid since said date."

Mr. CANNON. And add improvements to the property.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that you already get your deduction for taxes and interest, and when you sell the property you get your deduction for the permanent improvements that you have made to the property.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You make an allowance in your income reckonings for the taxes you pay, but if a man owns property in March, 1913, for which he paid at that time $10,000, and on which he pays $2,500 or $3,000 in taxes and sustains the loss of interest on his investment, and sells it at the end of the five years in 1918, it is unfair to say that the difference between the original appraisal value and the exact selling price is income. I say that is not profit.

Mr. KITCHIN. The taxes are deducted in this law and in the laws of 1916 and 1913.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but did he say that the taxes were deducted?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In ascertaining the profit made upon the sale of the property?

Mr. KITCHIN. Surely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No, there is not a line in any one of those acts that allows for a deduction of taxes in ascertaining the profit derived from a sale of property.

Mr. KITCHIN. You compute your income each year, and every man here has deducted taxes for that particular year. Of course they do.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes, but that is not the question. The gentleman answers me by suggesting that in some other calculation the taxes paid are allowed to be deducted. The taxes paid in the instances in which they are allowed to be deducted are allowances in ascertaining the net income for that year.

Mr. KITCHIN. But——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Oh, the gentleman will pardon me. Do not interrupt me, please. When you are ascertaining the value of property in order to find out how much profit a man made out of the sale of that property, you ought to take out the expenses of his maintenance of that property, taxes and interest, before you find the sum upon which you are going to levy an income tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not make it any plainer to the gentleman than to say that the cost of maintenance is a part of operating expenses of the property for that year and you deduct that. You deduct the taxes you pay on that property that year. Let us say that the property was worth on March 1, 1913, $10,000, although he might not have paid more than $5,000. If he pays $500 in taxes and $500 for maintenance of the property he would deduct $1,000 from his profits. Suppose he sells it for $20,000?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But there is no provision in the law for making those deductions in ascertaining the profits of a sale, and I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that in my experience with the Treasury Department I have found they recognize no such rule as that which he states. Therefore, it ought to be stated in haec verba in the bill, and then it will not be disobeyed by the servants of the Nation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Deducting all expenses and all taxes is expressly set forth in this act as plain as language can make it—all taxes paid or accrued within the taxable year, and so forth.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; but does not the gentleman see that that is ascertaining a man's income for the taxable year?

Mr. KITCHIN. But——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Oh, the gentleman will pardon me a moment. He must not talk all of the time, even though he be chairman of the committee. I wish the gentleman would allow me to make my statement, and then I shall listen patiently to hear his statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let the gentleman make his statement.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Because we can not arrive at any discernment of the truth if we both talk at once. All I care for is that an equitable principle, if my thought is right, shall be written into this bill. If my thought is wrong, then the gentleman can vote it down. I say that, to my mind, it is manifestly unfair to say that the basis for computing the profit shall be the fair market price or value of such property as of that date. By that language you exclude the consideration of everything else, because it is the fair market value of that property as of that date which is to be deducted from the sale price, and the difference is the profit on which the man is going to be taxed.

And you ought to add it to your bill in that place, for if you are furnishing the Treasury Department with a yardstick you want to give a true yardstick that means all that you say and intend to mean, and not give them a yardstick that is 5 or 6 inches short.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I think I understand the gentleman and want to say to the gentleman I think his thought is clearly wrong. This is exactly the language of the present act and in the deduction the Treasury Department has allowed in taxing incomes a deduction from profits of all taxes paid upon that property, all interest that is paid out on that property, and all expenses in maintaining and the upkeep of that property, and those deductions are allowed in section 214. In other words——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get through. In other words, if on March——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question at that point?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get through with my sentence and give an illustration. If on March 1, 1913, property which I bought for $5,000 is worth $10,000 and in 1918 I sell it for $20,000, before I get my profit I deduct all the taxes that I have paid during that year—the gentleman need not shake his head—I have deducted the taxes I paid in 1914, in 1915, 1916, and 1917 the same way. I am permitted to deduct each year the cost of operating or maintaining that property, Say that in 1918 you paid out $500 for taxes and $1,000 for maintenance and operation. You add that to your $10,000, the value as of March 1, 1913, and you have $11,500, and you deduct that from $20,000. You have, then, $8,500 taxable profit or income. The gentleman's proposition would allow a double deduction for operating and current expenses and taxes if we allowed them in determining the taxable income for each year and then allowed them again in determining gain at the time of sale.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Take the case of a man who is below the income-return basis.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He makes no returns during those five years. How does this law affect him in connection with the question of deducting taxes and interest and——

Mr. KITCHIN. He is exempt from payment of tax. He has had no net income, and perhaps the very deduction of his tax on his operating expenses and interest would be the reason why he has no net income.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He has paid no taxes at all; he has had no allowance of taxes from his income, because he has paid no income return.

Mr. KITCHIN. Because, possibly, by deducting his taxes and operating expenses he has had no taxable income, whereas if they had not been deducted he would have an income perhaps to exceed his personal exemption.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The difficulty I see lies in this. The gentleman desires to sustain his bill, which I think is not the principal object in our discussion, because we want to sustain it if it is right, and if it is not right we want to amend it, because it is going to fall on every taxpayer in the country, and fall very heavily, too. Now, the difficulty is that our point of divergence lies here. The gentleman says the provisions of the bill provide that a man may deduct from his income return the tax that he pays. That is very true; I admit that. The bill does provide for that, but when is that deduction made and for what purpose? It is the deduction made out of the amount of his income to show what the net amount is upon which he is going to pay a tax. How does that help him when he comes to sell, if a piece of property that has lain fallow and unused four or five years, and which in March, 1913, was worth so much money——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes, in order to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. How does that help or affect a man who owned a piece of property worth $5,000 on March 1, 1913, and he has paid $500, we will say, in taxes, and he has lost $300 in interest; that is $800. Now, he sells the property for $800 more than he paid for it. Under this bill you are going to tax him, in the language of this section, for the difference between the value of it in 1913 and the sales price, and you do not allow anything for taxes or interest.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that he is not right, for it is exactly as it is in existing law, and there is no complaint about that. The gentleman seems to differentiate between profits from sales of property and incomes from other sources. There is absolutely no difference.

Now, I receive as a lawyer $10,000 for my earnings. And I have $10,000 of interest on bonds and I sell a piece of property and I make $10,000 on that. That is a total of $30,000. All my deductions come out of that, my deduction for paying the taxes on the $10,000 worth of property that I have sold, the cost of its maintenance and upkeep, all come out of the $30,000. Now, I have paid in 1918 in interest on this piece of property that I have bought, on which I made a profit of $10,000 a year, so much, and I deduct that interest from the total. Now, if the gentleman means that I have bought a piece of property for $10,000 cash, and I sell it five years after at a profit, that I should deduct the interest I am out each year, I would say it is practically absurd. I am investing my money for a profit, instead of my interest, and when I make my sale I am expecting my profit there. I put $10,000 in a bond and I am expecting 6 per cent interest. That is my profit. I am not allowed to deduct 6 per cent interest on the $10,000 investment in a bond because I am going to get my interest. When I am investing for rents I am getting the rent. Now, when I sell the property with the expectation of making a profit, my interest, rent, and everything are merged into those profits. I am going into it for the profit. I should not be allowed interest on the property any more than the interest on the investment in a bond.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a single question? I ask for recognition, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] that in the case of a farmer who farms his land you do not permit him to deduct 6 per cent on his investment. Take a manufacturer who has a plant worth a million dollars; you do not allow him 6 per cent on his investment. His income is the profit. No tax law in the world has ever allowed such a deduction for income-tax purposes.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman a question. An individual on the 1st of March, 1913, buys a piece of land for $10,000, totally unimproved and unproductive. He then proceeds to expend $5,000 in improvements. That makes an expenditure of $15,000. Now, he pays taxes, and so forth, upon it from year to year. He sells it on the 1st day of March, 1918, for $20,000. Now, there is the original cost, $10,000; improvements, $5,000; the taxes year by year; and he pays something for maintenance. Can he take out his cost of improvements?

Mr. KITCHIN. He can. His $5,000 will be taken out.

Mr. CANNON. He can take out his taxes——

Mr. KITCHIN. For the current year. Of course he gets his tax deduction each year.

Mr. CANNON. But that is a very good answer if he has other property. I am putting it where the poor devil has not any other property.

Mr. KITCHIN. Each year there was an unearned increment, and he ought to pay some income tax on that, then, if he has got to deduct his taxes from it.

Mr. CANNON. He pays on his unearned increment, but pays his taxes. Then I understand, under the law as it is now and as it is proposed to be, if that is the only property he has, he could deduct his $5,000 for improvement and deduct, if it cost him that much, his $1,000, when he sold it on the 1st of March, 1918. That would be a deduction of $6,000 and then the taxes for 1918?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And he would be out the taxes for the other five years?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman understands, taking the whole bill together, that that would be the condition of the man in the payment of his income?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Where is the part of the bill that authorizes the deduction the gentleman from Illinois has spoken of?

Mr. KITCHIN. The improvements?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is included as investment, a part of his capital. And in every form the gentleman from Pennsylvania has ever seen is contained "permanent improvements." You add it for invested capital and excess profit. You add it as part of your capital.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not want to be contentious, but I would like to put this thought to the gentleman. Where I have seen those income-tax returns—and I have made out a good many of them for other people——

Mr. KITCHIN. I happen to have had an experience myself, for I sold a farm last year that I bought before March 1, 1913, and I looked at the part as to permanent improvements particularly, and the permanent improvements that I had put on were added to the purchase price of my farm. And it is in every other form that I have seen.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And not added to the cost——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have a form here, if the gentleman wishes to see it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Now, what I wish to call attention to is this, and I ask the attention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to this thought: You are speaking of the form of return that is provided by the Treasury Department. Is it true that that form of return, in compliance with the law, contains a space for deducting from the income return for the particular year of taxes and the allowance for depreciation or improvement?

But that does not answer the proposition put by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] with respect to the ascertainment of a separate and different basis for taxes, to wit: You sell your farm, which cost so much money in 1913; you sell it for an enlarged price in 1918, and you have carried it without a tenant, we will say, without a penny of income from it. You have paid the tax on it; you have either paid interest on the mortgage in carrying it, or you have lost the interest on the sum that you have invested in the property. Now, my amendment provides affirmatively that the department shall recognize, in using the yardstick which this section provides, these added elements; and in order to make it clear when the time comes, I am going to ask unanimous consent to add the words "less income from the property," so that it will be equitable both ways. That is to say, that in the ascertainment of a certain amount as profit or income you must allow for the taxes and the interest on the investment, less the income derived from the property, and this, together with the value in 1913, deducted from the amount that you receive, shows the amount that you must pay a tax on under this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, you are permitted to use as capital the interest paid on the mortgage or borrowed money, together with taxes or any other upkeep, but you are not permitted to use as capital the interest accrued upon your own cash payment, because that is income to you and is considered income of this year, although you paid out that money five years ago. That is to say, if you paid cash for the property in 1913, no accrued interest will be permitted to be used by you as capital, because that is considered income.

Now, suppose you made no more profit out of your purchase than the accrued interest on your original investment. That is the income, the interest on your original investment. But if you had borrowed all that money you will be entitled to charge it as a part of your cost the money paid out in interest upon that borrowed money.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can not understand the difference between borrowing the money and taking it out of my own pocket and putting it into the farm. You have lost your interest on it. That is part of cost of the property when you come to sell it. Your taxes and your interest ought to be deducted.

Mr. SNYDER. Is not that the same profit that would be permitted to the corporation, to charge 6 per cent on its capital invested in the business and deduct that before any amount was shown to be taxable?

Mr. FORDNEY. You do allow a rate of interest—I believe it was 8 per cent under the old bill—before you make an excess-profit tax.

Mr. SNYDER. We are not allowed any interest on the invested capital in the business. We are allowed 8 per cent on the profit.

Mr. FORDNEY. That would not apply unless the corporation is selling its invested capital, and then the difference between the purchase price and the sale price must be ascertained and the cost of the upkeep must be deducted.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think I can clear this up. I desire three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. In the first place, I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has read the bill very carefully and read the other sections of the bill. He certainly would not want to put his amendment in this section. This section is simply defining a rule and establishing the basis for determining the gain from the sale of property purchased before March 1, 1913. The amendment should be in section 214, the deduction section. I want to say that it has never been contended by an industry in this country that the gentleman's proposition is proper and right. We tax incomes of all corporations, of all mercantile business, and all kinds of industries. Take an industry, whether it is individual or corporate, with a million dollars' capital. We tax the profits of that concern just exactly like we tax the profits of the sales of land. Instead of this concern having a sale every year or two months, it has a sale every day. Now, suppose it has a capital invested at a million dollars. Do we permit this business concern to deduct from its income, as a part of the cost, 6 per cent on the capital invested? No. We simply permit them to deduct all the labor and raw material costs, insurance, taxes, bad sales, and overhead charges, and not 6 per cent upon the invested capital; and when it deducts those operating expenses and overhead charges to which I have called attention, if it does not make but 4 per cent on the capital invested, it pays the income tax on the 4 per cent profits. But if you deduct 6 per cent on the $1,000,000 capital invested as part of the operating expenses, the concern would have to make a good deal more than 6 per cent before the income tax would attach. Such a proposition would be an excess-profits tax.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Do you think it fair for a corporation or individual to give himself credit for a rental in a case where he owns his own building?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want to ask me a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if in his judgment, and in respect to his knowledge of the bill, he would consider that a man owning his property has the right to charge himself with that property as a rental or expense account?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. WINSLOW. But if he hired property of the same value he would charge himself value. He would have to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Under the existing law a corporation is allowed a deduction for rent actually paid.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is a pity we can not get two interpreters of that law to agree on the same thing.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is any doubt of the interpretation of the law. The Treasury Department does not take into consideration the rental value of my home, if I own it.

Mr. WINSLOW. Here is a productive business, and it affects the cost of production in competition. Why should one man, who rents property, be allowed to charge up the rent as a part of his expenses, while another man, who owns his property, is penalized by the fact that he owns it?

Mr. KITCHIN. You must distinguish between an individual owning his home or renting his home——

Mr. WINSLOW. I said a corporation.

Mr. KITCHIN. If I rent the house I live in, I can not deduct the rent, because that is a part of my living expenses. If I own my home, rent is not considered. If as a merchant or business man I own my storehouse I make no deduction, and that is ignored; but if I pay $2,000 a year rent, I am permitted to deduct that as a part of the operating expenses of my business.

Mr. WINSLOW. But if a man owns his property he is not entitled to charge himself rent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have answered the gentleman the best I know. A man can not charge himself rent on property that he owns as a part of his expenses.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman one question, and then I am through?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has referred to section 214 as covering this subject. Now, does section 214, in the gentleman's serious and calm judgment, cover that subject? Let me illustrate just one thing.

Mr. KITCHIN. Section 214 covers all deductions.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. To be done how? Not in ascertaining the profit from the sale of some particular property, but the deductions to be allowed in ascertaining the net income for that particular year. It says that all the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year shall be deducted. You can see that that is the yardstick that is applied only to the ascertainment of the net income. There the taxes are to be deducted; but it does not apply to the question of an isolated piece of property that is bought at a particular figure, carried with heavy taxes and expense in the way of loss of income and interest, and then sold at a profit. The yardstick that you furnish there is the one in section 201, and none other in this bill. There is not another syllable in the bill, from beginning to end, that applies to that subject. I have read it carefully from one end to the other.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I have explained to the gentleman time and again, I think he mixes up income and profit. Part of his income is profit from land. Part of his income is what he makes as a lawyer or a merchant. I call attention to the fact that all of the deductions to which he is equitably entitled are comprised in section 214.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; but that is in ascertaining the income for that year. That has nothing to do with the sale of the property.

Mr. KITCHIN. In voting down the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] we decided that the income is the profit for the year in which he receives his earnings or profit, or whatever it is. Now, I call attention to the form of the department, which is the rule of the department for including improvements.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is the same thing. That is in section 214.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is the original cost of the property, if it was acquired since March 1, 1913, the cost of any permanent improvements, and so forth. That is the example I gave to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is a totally different thing from the thing we are discussing, so do not let us camouflage.

Mr. KITCHIN. This section to which the gentleman is applying his remarks is simply a basis—that is, a starting point—for deductions or exemptions. What should be subtracted from it or what should be added, starting from that point, is found in section 214; and if you think that amount should be more, then section 214 is the place to add it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to put my amendment verbally in proper form so that it may be voted on intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to restate his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. After the word "date," in line 26, add the words "plus taxes, improvements paid thereon, and interest on the investment from said date, less all income derived from the property."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as restated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 4, line 26, after the word "date" insert the words "plus taxes, improvements paid thereon, and interest on the investment from said date, less all income derived from the property."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 18, noes 47.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PART II.—INDIVIDUALS.

NORMAL TAX.

SEC. 210. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax, as follows:

(a) In the case of a citizen or resident of the United States 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That upon the first $4,000 of this amount the rate shall be 6 per cent;

(b) In the case of a nonresident alien, 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 5, line 13, after the word "That" insert "in lieu of the taxes imposed by subdivision (a) of section 1 of the revenue act of 1916 and by section 1 of the revenue act of 1917" and a comma.

Mr. KITCHIN. That ought to have been put into the bill, and will be put in in many other places. It is in lieu of those taxes. Those words might be construed that this act is not inconsistent with these other acts, and it might be held to be in addition.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does this act repeal the other acts?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not specifically; but we provide here specifically in lieu of those taxes. There are some things in the other act that we could not repeal. All the tax features are carried in this act, and practically, of course, repeal the others.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand, then, from the gentleman's statement that there are certain features of the act of 1916 and of the act of 1917 which still continue in force?

Mr. KITCHIN. But take the act of March 3, 1916; there are certain tariff matters——

Mr. WALSH. But those are not tax features. The tax features of 1913 and 1916, are they specifically repealed?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; by putting in this language. It is provided in section 1400 "that any provision of any act inconsistent with any provision of this act is hereby repealed, subject to the limitations provided in subdivision (b)."

Mr. WALSH. Then what is the need of putting in these words?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the point; it may be that it might be construed as not inconsistent; it might be construed as additional; and we want to make it clear.

Mr. WALSH. It looks to me like a double repeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SURTAX.

SEC. 211. That in addition to the normal tax imposed by section 210 there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual, a surtax equal to the sum of the following:

Two per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A great deal was said in general debate about the propriety of taxing the income of wage earners making high wages during the war time. I have in my hand a communication from the Shipping Board giving a list or schedule of wages paid in various shipyards in the United States, and I ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing that communication.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMLIN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD
EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., August 7, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Hurley has asked me to reply to your letter of July 26 seeking information concerning the number of workers in shipyards and their rates of pay. Inasmuch as it is my understanding that you do not wish this matter in great detail, I submit the following reply:

1. All told, the number of workers in shipyards performing work for the Emergency Fleet Corporation is about 375,000.

2. I append the scale of rates authorized for the different classes of these workers, according to the findings of the Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board.

3. As regards hours of work, the basic eight-hour day is being observed. In certain districts only 8 hours are actually worked. In other districts 9 and 10 hours are worked regularly at the rate of time and a half or double time for overtime.

If this does not give the information desired, I shall be very glad to supply such details as you wish.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES PIEZ, Vice President.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments, which should be read as one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 24, after the word "That," insert the following: "in lieu of the taxes imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of the revenue act of 1916, and by section 2 of the revenue act of 1917, but."

Page 5, line 25, after the figures "210," insert "of this act" and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in the normal-tax schedule, section a, in case of a citizen resident of the United States a 12 per cent tax is provided, and on the first $4,000 the rate shall be 6 per cent. When you come to the surtax you begin at $5,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Where it is in the present law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What is the status of that thousand dollars between $4,000 and $5,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the normal tax, the normal tax on $4,000 we only desire to make one-half, or 6 per cent. If the man had $6,000 he would have $2,000 exemption and $4,000 subject—not to 12 per cent, but 6 per cent tax. When you get to the surtax that is on the whole income and has nothing to do with the $4,000 exemption.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Sixty per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000; and

Sixty-five per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $5,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the tax is 60 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000, and 65 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $5,000,000.

Now, it is 50 per cent on the amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $200,000; 48 per cent on the amount by which the net income exceeds $90,000 and does not exceed $100,000. There is considerable difference on the man that has $30,000 or $40,000 and the fellow that has $1,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $2,000,000. It seems to me that you decrease the tax as you go up. If the man has $5,000,000 you leave him $1,500,000. When you get down to the fellow that has a family and has an income of $30,000 you do not leave him a great deal, but when you get up into the multimillionaire class you leave him a grand fortune. "To him that hath shall be given; but whosoever hath not from him shall be taken away even that he hath." I was just wondering why the tax that would leave very little to the man of modest income is so high, and why the tax that would leave the millionaire that has many millions should be reduced.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman has read the figures wrong. For instance, we tax a man who has $30,000 about 19 per cent.

From a man with an income of $50,000 we take 24.9 per cent, just about half of what Great Britain does.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, let us eliminate Great Britain and France for the time being.

Mr. KITCHIN. From the man who gets $5,000,000 we take 70 per cent, about four times as much as we take from the man who has an income of $30,000.

Mr. CANNON. But he is still left with a great deal, is he not, and they are both American citizens?

Mr. KITCHIN. We had that proposition put up to us pretty strongly by Mr. Marsh, secretary and treasurer of some kind of an economic society, and we had one gentleman on the committee who desired to follow out the principle which the gentleman evidently has in mind, and that is to take all over a certain amount—that is, not 60 or 70 per cent, but 100 per cent. I think the suggestion was made that we take all over $100,000, and then some one suggested that we take all over $200,000. That is along the line of the gentleman's intimation, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I would not be quite so severe as that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose a man had $10,000,000 income and we would take 99 per cent of it, it would still leave him a great deal more than some fellow with an income of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. In the nature of things, we thought it was just and equitable to make the larger fortunes pay the larger percentage.

Mr. CANNON. But you do not do that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, we do.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, you do. Go ahead, I admit that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Where a man has $10,000 income we take 8 per cent of his total net income.

Mr. CANNON. But you have already taken 12 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; adding in the 12 per cent, and that bracket, I will say to the gentleman that what we do is this: In surtax and normal tax, where a man has an income of $10,000 we take 8.45 per cent. Where a man has $20,000 we take a total of 14 per cent. That includes the normal tax and the surtax.

Mr. CANNON. He pays the normal tax on everything, does he not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Take it on page 6, line 13:

Twenty per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $40,000.

The man who has an income of $40,000 not only pays 20 per cent upon the difference between thirty and forty thousand dollars, but he pays the per cent on each amount above that in the other brackets. He pays 15 per cent upon the amount between twenty and thirty thousand dollars, 10 per cent upon the amount between $15,000 and $20,000, 7 per cent upon the amount between $10,000 and $15,000, 3 per cent upon the amount between $7,500 and $10,000, and 2 per cent upon the amount between $5,000 and $7,500.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; but let me add right there: Does not a man pay all through these brackets 12 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; after deducting his personal exemption. The first $4,000 of his net income subject to normal tax is taxable at 6 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Twelve per cent on the whole thing after his deductions; but as he increases in income he adds to the 12 per cent an additional 20 or 30.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Or 40 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Where a man has an income of $100,000 we take 39 per cent of the total income, and where he has an income of $500,000 we take 59½ per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Which leaves him how much?

Mr. KITCHIN. Forty and a-half per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Of his $500,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Where a man has a million dollars we take 64.70 per cent, and where he has $5,000,000 we take 70 per cent. Does the gentleman think that we have not gone high enough on those incomes? Where a man has an income of a million dollars, should we take more than $647,000?

Mr. CANNON. But I have listened to speeches of Members of Congress and people upon the stump who have an idea that nobody has any right to make $5,000,000 or $1,000,000. He receives protection in all his individual rights and all his property, and I have heard the argument made, Why should a person who has only $10,000 a year or twenty or thirty thousands of dollars need but very little, while the man who makes a million or ten million dollars must have three or four million dollars remaining, as the case may be; and that God intended that all people should approach equality, and all that kind of thing; and there is a very well-founded campaign existing throughout the country that we should take the whole thing when a man gets up into the millions; that he ought to have nothing beyond enough to support his wife and family and care for them when he dies; that he is a plutocrat, and we should take it all. That is a very plausible statement, but this bill is not framed exactly upon that foundation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that our committee heard before the committee and outside of the committee some arguments along the line intimated by the gentleman from Illinois, but we did not think them sound, and therefore we did not go to the extent of confiscation in these schedules. And I believe myself it is a bit higher than the gentleman himself is willing to go. I think, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] said the other day and several other gentlemen, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and it was the thought of the committee, that on these high rates we have gone just as high as it is safe both for business and safe for the marketing of Government securities for us to go.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I just wanted to call attention—it may be the bill does not quite agree with the stump speeches throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

GROSS INCOME DEFINED.

SEC. 213. That for the purposes of this title (except as otherwise provided in section 233) the term "gross income"—

(a) Includes gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal service (including in the case of the President of the United States, the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States, and all other officers and employees, whether elected or appointed, of the United States, or of any State, Alaska, Hawaii, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, the compensation received as such), of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, or from professions, vocations, trades, businesses, commerce, or sales, or dealings in property, whether real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in such property; also from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever. The amount of all such items shall be included in the gross income for the taxable year in which received by the taxpayer, unless, under methods of accounting permitted under subdivision (b) of section 212, any such amounts are to be properly accounted for as of a different period; but.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the paragraph. After the word "personal," in line 2, page 9, insert the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 2, after the word "personal," insert the word "or."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a careful reading of that section discloses that the word "or" is left out of that language. It undertakes to define gross income, defines it as gains, profits, incomes, and so forth, received from professions, vocations, trades, businesses, commerce, or sales, or "dealings in property, whether real or personal," and then in the original text following the words "growing out of the ownership" or "use or interest in such property." Now, if that relates directly to the word "personal," they may be limiting the word "property" as the income and gains growing out of the use or ownership or use of or interest in such property. Now, clearly the word "dealings" refers to "or sales of property," and that is one classification. The income derived by the sale of property is by the dealings in property, and this is intended to tax this kind of transaction as income. Then, it seems to me that it is intended also to tax any other gains or profits growing out of the ownership or use and interest in such property which would include any profits on that in the way of royalty or rent or actual occupation of the property for business purposes or any other use to which it could be put which would bring in an income return. In other words, those two things, "dealing in property" on the one side and "growing out of the use or interest in such property" on the other, are two distinct things—that is, they are two distinct sources of income—and it seems to me they ought to be separated by the disjunctive "or" instead of one being put with a grammatical limitation on the other.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman has construed it like we construed it and like the Treasury Department construed it. Now, this part of the provision is exactly the language of the present law, and the department has made its rulings upon it, and I doubt whether we ought to put in the word "or."

Mr. BORLAND. I have heard the language of the present law very severely criticized by lawyers on that account.

Mr. KITCHIN. Here is what it means: Read it this way, "or sales or dealings in property, whether real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in such property." Do not you see, "growing out of the ownership of it"?

Mr. BORLAND. That limits——

Mr. KITCHIN. Or selling or leasing it.

Mr. BORLAND. That limits the word "dealings."

Mr. KITCHIN. No; "or sales."

Mr. BORLAND. "Or sales" would mean sales or dealings.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us read it as it is and as cut off by a comma—"or sales, or dealings in property, whether real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in such property." Now, the gentleman says he wants rents and royalties. Then this follows, "also from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever." So you see rents, perhaps, are taken care of in the sentence immediately following, and I think it inadvisable to put this language in as existing law has now been correctly construed.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose one makes an income from dealings in property which does not grow out of the use or ownership of the property. Suppose some broker or agent makes money out of dealings in property and he does not own it and does not use it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The words "from any source whatever," catch that.

Mr. BORLAND. It occurred to me so. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment; it is only a verbal amendment, and I simply desired to suggest it to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment. Page 8, line 22, strike out the words "of any State."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 22, strike out the words "of any State."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the proposed amendment is to exclude from the income tax the salary or compensation of the officials of the several States. The consideration that constrains me to offer the amendment relates in no way to the economic object or fiscal policy of the bill. I submit this amendment on the ground that Congress has no constitutional authority to tax the salaries or the compensations, the means, or the agencies by which the several States administer their governments; and upon a careful examination of the question I submit that no lawyer in this body can reach any other conclusion. Our system of government, it may be elementary to observe, is a dual system. The States within their constitutional powers are as supreme as the Federal Government within its constitutional powers. This has been held over and over again by the Supreme Court of the Nation, and it is manifestly self-evident.

A very eminent authority, Mr. Cooley, in his Principles of Constitutional Law, says:

> The power to tax, whether by the United States or by the States, is to be construed in the light of, and limited by, the fact that the States and the Union are inseparable, and that the Constitution contemplates the perpetual maintenance of each with all its constitutional powers, unembarrassed and unimpaired by any action of the other.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has he taken these textbook writings in connection with the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not take the textbooks alone, but I take the textbooks and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. GARNER. Have there been any decisions of the Supreme Court directly upon the sixteenth amendment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In a few moments I hope I will be able to convince the gentleman that there have been such decisions.

Cooley argues that this equality of sovereignty will be impaired or destroyed if the taxing power of either government is extended to or imposed upon the other.

He says:

> The taxing power of the Federal Government does not, therefore, extend to the means or agencies through or by the employment of which the States perform their essential functions, since, if these were within its reach, they might be embarrased, and perhaps wholly paralyzed, by the burdens it should impose.

Cooley then quotes from the famous decision of McCulloch against Maryland, the opinion being that of Chief Justice Marshall:

> "That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance in conferring on one government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, in respect to those very measures, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied." It is true that taxation does not necessarily and unavoidably destroy, and that to carry it to the excess of destruction would be an abuse not to be anticipated; but the very power would take from the States a portion of their intended liberty of independent action within the sphere of their powers and would constitute to the State perpetual danger of embarrassment and possible annihilation. The Constitution contemplates no such shackles upon State powers and by implication forbids them.
> The United States, therefore, can not tax a State municipal corporation or its resources, or the salary of a State officer, or the process of State courts, or a railroad owned by a State, and so on. And, on the other hand, a State can not tax the salary or emoluments of Federal officers, or the bonds or other securities issued under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, or the revenue stamps or Treasury notes issued by the United States, or a bank created by the United States as its fiscal agent, or the franchise of a corporation created by the United States, except with the consent of Congress, and so on.

The direct question as to whether or not it is competent for Congress to impose a tax upon the salary of judicial officers of a State was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Collector against Day in Eleventh Wallace Reports, page 113. The court, in reviewing the case of Dobbins against the Commissioners of Erie County, where it was held that it was not competent for a State to tax the salary of an officer of the United States, and the cases of McCulloch against Maryland and Weston against Charleston, as settling the principle that State governments can not lay a tax upon the constitutional means employed by the Federal Government to execute its constitutional powers, held broadly that the converse principle was equally sound, and consequently it was not competent for Congress to impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of a State.

In the very striking opinion of Collector against Day the court said, among other things, that—

> The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme, but the States within the limits of their powers not granted or, in the language of the tenth amendment, "reserved," are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States.
> And if the means and instrumentalities employed by that Government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are, necessarily, and, for the sake of self-preservation, exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States depending upon their reserved powers, for like reasons, equally exempt from Federal taxation? Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation, as any government whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government. Of what avail are these means if another power may tax them at discretion?

Mr. Chairman, it is impliedly or expressly conceded by gentlemen in this debate that prior to the adoption of the sixteenth amendment the doctrine expressed in the authorities which I have just read was unquestioned, and that the Congress could not impose an income tax upon the salaries of the officials of the States or on the bonds of States or the municipalities thereof. So prior to the amendment there can be no doubt that the power to tax State agencies and instrumentalities was not a power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Therefore I assume that if the securities, means, and agencies of the several States and their municipalities are now subject to taxation it must be that they constitute a new subject of taxation conferred by the sixteenth amendment. Mr. Chairman, I can find no eminent authority who ever suggested that this was a new subject of taxation save Gov. Hughes in a message to the Legislature of New York when considering the adoption of this amendment. It should be remembered that Mr. Hughes was not making a judicial deliverance, but submitting to the cautionary discretion of the legislature the suggestion that the amendment contained a germ of destruction of the powers and means of the States. He was dealing with policy, not law.

But, Mr. Chairman, the argument of Mr. Hughes was answered by one of the most distinguished of American jurists, Elihu Root; and, in my opinion, his answer was a triumphant refutation of the position taken by Mr. Hughes. And the Legislature of New York obviously so thought, for otherwise it is not conceivable that it would have adopted the amendment.

I repeat that the section of the bill which it is proposed to amend is based upon the contention that the sixteenth amendment creates new subjects of taxation, and within this new category of subjects fall the means and agencies of the States and their municipalities. This contention, I submit, has been uniformly denied by the Supreme Court. In the case of Brushaber versus Railway Co., 240 United States Reports, page 17, decided January 24, 1916, the court, after quoting the amendment, which is as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration—

Held that—

It is clear on the face of this text [of the amendment] that it does not purport to confer power to levy income taxes in a generic sense—an authority already possessed and never questioned—or to limit and distinguish between one kind of income taxes and another, but that the whole purpose of the amendment was to relieve all income taxes when imposed from apportionment from a consideration of the source whence the income was derived.

In the case of Stanton against Mining Co., likewise found in 240 United States Reports, page 12, decided February 21, 1916, the court unanimously held that—it was settled that the provisions of the sixteenth amendment conferred no new power of taxation, but simply prohibited the previous complete and plenary power of income taxation possessed by Congress from the beginning from being taken out of the category of indirect taxation, to which it inherently belonged, and being placed in the category of direct taxation, subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the income was derived; that is, by testing the tax, not by what it was—a tax on income—but by a mistaken theory deduced from the origin or source of the income taxed.

In connection with the two cases just cited, I ask the committee to observe that the decision in each case was unanimous and was assented to by Mr. Justice Hughes, former governor of the State of New York, and therefore Mr. Hughes as a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States has disagreed with Mr. Hughes as the chief executive of the State of New York. This is to his credit.

The last adjudication I am able to find of the Supreme Court is the case of Peck against Lowe, decided May 20, 1918. In considering a phase of an income tax involved in this case, the court held that the sixteenth amendment—does not extend the taxing power to new or excepted subjects, but merely removes all occasion, which otherwise might exist, for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on income, whether it be derived from one source or another.

So, Mr. Chairman, I submit it as beyond controversy that a tax upon salaries or compensation of State officials or upon securities of States or their municipalities has been clearly held by the Supreme Court not to be a new tax and not affected by the sixteenth amendment.

In the case of Pollock against Farmers' Bank, known as the famous income-tax decision, the question was as to the constitutionality of incomes in the form of rents from real estate and income derived from certain personal property. The constitutionality of the tax as a tax per se was not controverted. The position taken by the court in that case was that such an income was a direct tax and therefore would have to be apportioned among the several States. In other words, the tax itself was valid, but the mode or method of laying the tax was invalid. Therefore the sixteenth amendment was adopted not for the purpose of securing new subjects of taxation but to remove the clumsy and slow method of apportionment of a valid tax. The bill under discussion involves a far different question, for it undertakes to impose a tax upon a new subject and upon a subject which the Congress of the United States has not the legislative power to impose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman consider that in setting aside the necessity for an apportionment of the tax you extend the power of the Congress to levy a tax with respect to whether or not it was taking away the right of the States to find revenue to maintain their own governments?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I catch the gentleman's inquiry correctly, I answer that this amendment has not affected at all the powers of the States or the Nation with respect to the subject of taxation. It has only determined the method by which Congress must exercise its power to tax—it is wholly of a regulatory character.

To repeat, I would say that before the sixteenth amendment Congress could tax incomes, but it must then tax incomes by the method of apportionment among the States. Since the amendment, and by virtue of the amendment, Congress must tax incomes directly and not by apportionment. Therefore, the amendment does not create new subjects of taxation but does create a new method of reaching taxable subjects, namely, by the method of an income tax.

Mr. Chairman, we should not grow hysterical by reason of this war. The equilibrium of the National Government and the State governments should be preserved. The tax proposed in this section of the bill will, in my opinion, destroy this equilibrium, and will dislocate our great Federal system. I hope the Congress will not impose the taxes in question, and if the Congress does make the imposition of such taxes I believe it will do a futile and vain thing, because such action will be beyond the legislative power of Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Would not the gentleman's reasoning apply with exactly the same force, that the sixteenth amendment does not extend the taxing power along new subjects of taxation or any subjects forbidden by the Constitution? Would not that apply with equal force to including the salary of the President of the United States and of the judges of the Supreme Court and district courts of the United States?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think by reason of the distinct constitutional provisions the Congress has no authority to tax the compensation of the President and the Federal judges. Their salaries can not be reduced during their term of office. To reply that the reduction of these salaries by the process of taxation is not a reduction is an arbitrary conclusion. Moreover, I think it unwise and ungracious radically to reduce the salary of the President as proposed in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I submit, in conclusion, that no such exigencies now confront us as to warrant our departure from the Constitution or to break over the established domains of the States and of the Union. The States have no power to tax the agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal Government, and conversely the Federal Government upon the same principle has no power to tax the agencies and instrumentalities of the States. These several sovereignties stand upon a parity of power in this particular. They are each within a zone sufficient for their self-preservation. If the State is not supreme in fixing the salaries and compensation of its own officers, and preserving its own bonds and securities from taxation by the Federal Government, then the State's power is paper and nothing else. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am sorry that I was not in the Hall when the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] made his motion and made his argument. I am handicapped by the fact that I came in only during the delivery of his closing remarks.

I hope that the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail. In this national crisis, when the Committee on Ways and Means was confronted with the duty of preparing the revenue bill to raise about $8,000,000,000, the committee was of the opinion that if it was lawful for Federal officials and State officials to pay an income tax, as every other citizen of the United States must pay, they ought to be required to pay it. The committee was not without doubt as to whether or not the provision was constitutional.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I prefer to go on with my statement. I did not hear the gentleman's argument, and I prefer to make my statement.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My question would not be pertinent except to that remark.

Mr. CRISP. The committee had doubt, I say, as to the constitutionality of the provision requiring State officials to pay an income tax if their salary came within the purview of the law, but the committee thought that if there was any question about it, that question should be resolved in favor of the Government, and let the gentlemen enjoying those salaries in this crisis, if they question it, take the matter to the courts and let the courts determine it. The committee could see no reason in justice or equity why a man drawing a salary of $10,000 or more from the Federal Government or from a State government should be immune from paying any income tax and his neighbor across the street, who happened to earn three or four thousand dollars salary out of public office, be required to pay a tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. CRISP. I decline to yield to anyone until I get through with what I have to say, and then, if I can answer any question, I will try to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield to anyone.

Mr. CRISP. The committee was familiar with the decisions of Chief Justice Marshall and the others declaring that Congress had no power to tax State instrumentalities. But that, gentlemen of the committee, was prior to the adoption of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. I do not believe there can be any question whatever about the right of the Federal Congress to tax the incomes of Federal officials.

I have no fault or complaint to make at the salaries of the Federal judiciary. On the contrary, I do not believe the judiciary are sufficiently paid, and I will vote to increase their compensation. But I do not believe there should be that invidious distinction that because, forsooth, they hold a Federal judicial job with a large salary they should be immune from income taxes when the other citizens of this country pay income taxes. I do not think there is any question but that Congress has the power to tax them. The Constitution as to their salaries simply says:

The judges * * * shall * * * receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

That does not mean that they are exempt from taxes. That simply means that Congress by legislation shall not pass an act reducing their salaries. It does not exempt them or give them immunity from taxation. As I said before, I am perfectly willing to vote to increase their compensation. I believe the laborer is worthy of his hire, but I believe it is of no good to the body politic to have a certain class of officeholders exempt from taxation and the body of the people with similar salaries paying taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Now as to the right of the Federal Government to tax State officials, that is a more serious question.

When the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution was ratified it became, of course, a part of the Constitution. That amendment reads:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to the census or enumeration.

Now, I know it is a debatable question, but Mr. Justice Hughes, who we all recognize is an eminent lawyer, when governor of the State of New York sent a message to the New York Legislature urging them not to ratify or adopt this sixteenth amendment, for the reason that it gave the Federal Government the right to tax municipal and State bonds and salaries of officials. That was the ground on which he urged the legislature to refuse to ratify this amendment.

As I stated, it is doubtful, but the courts have not passed on that amendment. Neither has any court said, since the sixteenth amendment was adopted, that it was not constitutional to require State officials and Federal officials to pay income taxes. I do not agree for one moment that if a State official pays an income tax it confers on Congress the power to destroy the State government. I grant that if Congress were to single out and levy a tax against the salaries of State officials it would not be constitutional, but I think it is very debatable, when Congress passes a law saying that all the citizens of the United States, whether officeholders of the Federal Government or officeholders of the State, enjoying a certain income from whatever source derived, shall pay a tax thereon, whether the courts will hold that unconstitutional, and for one I want to put it up to the courts. [Applause.]

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will not the amendment, if adopted, exempt Members of Congress from income taxes on their salaries?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so. I think the salaries of Members of Congress are clearly subject to the payment of the income tax, with or without the amendment.

Mr. LONDON. When revenue is raised for war purposes, is it not raised for the purpose of enabling that very State government to exist?

Mr. CRISP. I think so. And, furthermore, I will say to the gentleman from New York that if any gentleman enjoying a Federal or State office, with an income sufficient to come within the purview of this law, wants to test it in the courts, I say to him, Go to it!

Mr. LONDON. But is not this revenue being raised for the purpose of continuing the very existence of the Government?

Mr. CRISP. I think so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman to say that he was in doubt about the constitutionality of this provision, and therefore wished to put it up to the courts.

Mr. CRISP. To try to recall exactly what I said, I think I said that the committee had doubts as to the constitutionality of it, but the committee thought in this national crisis and emergency they should resolve the doubt in favor of the Government.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not the accepted practice and construction in every State in the Union, and is it not the unbroken principle of the decisions of the courts, that when you are in doubt about the constitutionality of a matter you shall not impose it?

Mr. CRISP. I think there is splendid authority for that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And none to the contrary. This is new doctrine to me.

Mr. CRISP. Let me do the justice to my colleagues on the committee to say that I may not be expressing their views, and I assume full responsibility for the statement I have made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think this rests on the same ground as the taxation of municipal bonds? Is the same question involved here as is involved in our right to tax municipal bonds?

Mr. CRISP. Absolutely.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And we never will know whether we can tax them or not unless we pass this provision and leave it to the courts.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH offers the following substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 8, line 18, after the word "service," strike out all between the parentheses in lines 18 and 24.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], and I agree with him in the opinion that nothing in the sixteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has cited, gives the Government the right to tax incomes received by State officials as compensation or salary. Much stress is laid upon the words "from whatever source derived," but that is not the important phraseology in that amendment. The important phraseology is "taxes on incomes," and the amendment creates no new incomes or sources and makes nothing an income that was not an income before.

We ought not to tax the incomes of State officials. We ought not to tax the salary of the President of the United States or the salaries of the Federal judiciary. We have demands pending before the House at present to increase the salaries of the Federal judiciary from $6,000 up to $11,000 or $12,000 in some instances; and, of course, if we go to levying this income tax on them for the purpose of getting revenue you will find that instead of getting revenue we will increase our expenditures, because it will simply give impetus to the demand for increased compensation for the judiciary. The taxing of their salaries will be used as an excuse to increase their salaries and we will be urged to pay out many times more than what the tax amounts to.

But I desire to direct the attention of the committee to one of the clauses of Article II of the Constitution:

The President shall, at stated times, receive for services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

We have no right either by taxation or by direction or indirection under that provision of the Constitution to increase or diminish the salary of the President. Under the schedule laid out in this bill he would be taxed 42 per cent on his salary. But no matter what the rate of taxation is it diminishes the salary of the President of the United States. Oh, gentlemen say let the people who are involved go to the court and have the question raised. That is an unfair and cowardly way to handle this matter. These people who are performing the service are supposed to receive adequate salaries and compensation. If you want to pass an act permitting the President of the United States to serve without compensation, or judges to serve without compensation, why, pass that sort of a statute. But it is decidedly unfair to say that while the committee, or a member of it, may be doubtful as to the constitutionality of a provision, nevertheless because we are attempting to raise needed revenue we will put it up to the men we are seeking to tax, even though doubtful as to its constitutionality.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Does the gentleman contend that a provision requiring Federal officials to pay the income tax the same as all other persons is reducing their compensation within the meaning of the constitutional provision?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly do, as applied to the President and the judiciary.

Mr. CRISP. I differ with the gentleman; I have no doubt as to the constitutionality of the provision.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will tell me how you can tax the income which the President of the United States derives as compensation without diminishing his compensation, I should like to have him demonstrate it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. What was the purpose of putting that clause into the Constitution relative to the President's salary?

Mr. WALSH. I assume the purpose of it was so that the President's salary should be a certain fixed and definite sum that could not be tampered with while he held office.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not the theory in the constitutional debates. The debates show clearly that the purpose was that Congress might not punish or reward. Now, can it be said that Congress is punishing or rewarding when it makes a rule that applies universally to the citizenship, including the President of the United States?

Mr. WALSH. On that theory I submit that if we should be pushed to a rate of taxation whereby, instead of the amount in that bracket being, say, 20 per cent, it was 90 per cent upon the salary of that official, it certainly would be a punishment, and it is a diminution of the compensation.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman misses the point; it is a diminishing of the compensation in an indirect sense, but is it such a diminution as the framers of the Constitution had in mind which would be special to the person?

Mr. WALSH. It is not a direct decreasing of his compensation, but it results in the decreasing of his compensation, and it is an indirect attempt to reduce it. We ought not to step in and say to State officials, to legislators, or to the judges, or to the municipal officers, that we will tax them, but do not intend to decrease their compensation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is a provision of law that Congress can not change the salaries during the term for which Members are elected, and they are subject to taxes under this law. Congress, by the passage of this act, is not changing the compensation to be received by the President. We have not changed the salary at all; but if he receives it, we will put him in the class of the common citizenship and tax him like all other people, and he ought to be taxed.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's reasoning would be better if his premises were sound. There is no provision against a change of salary of a Member of Congress.

Mr. FORDNEY. During the time for which he is elected?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps I am wrong.

Mr. WALSH. There is no such provision as to Members of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman this question: After the President receives his salary it would be subject to taxation under the tax laws of the District, would it not, or under the tax laws wherever he lived?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It seems to me that after an officer receives his salary and has acquired the property it could be taxed.

Mr. WALSH. An income tax by the State?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No; personal-property tax, or any kind of a State tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A bank balance, for instance.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I assume that that may be so.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That would diminish his income just the same as imposing an income tax on his salary. I do not think the gentleman would say that that was a diminution of the salary prohibited, and yet it does diminish the salary just the same as an income tax diminishes it.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, in the one case you are taxing property; in this case it is a tax on his income.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman makes this distinction and bases it on the ground that they can not diminish the President's salary, but they do diminish it when they tax him locally.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for me to ask a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Do you not forget that you are discussing limitations in the Constitution as to the power of Congress? What has that to do with the question of local taxation? It says that Congress shall not do this thing.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Congress has the power to impose local taxes on a bank balance on the President's salary when he puts it in the bank; that is within our power to do in the District of Columbia. I do not think anyone ever thought to raise the question that we were prevented by the Constitution from imposing that tax upon the ground that it diminished his salary.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman go further and contend that Congress would have the power to impose a tax upon a bank balance in the State of Illinois?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If that is where the officeholder made his tax returns to the State.

Mr. WALSH. I mean as personal property—a bank balance as personal property.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Certainly not. The Federal Government could not do that, or never has attempted to do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is perhaps not quite so fundamental as some of the things the gentleman is discussing, and yet it is extremely important, it seems to me, and that is that the imposition of this tax upon the Federal judges certainly places them in a very peculiar situation, they being the people who must pass upon the constitutionality of the act, and every Federal judge in the United States is substantially disqualified by reason of his personal interest.

Mr. WALSH. I think that is very true with reference to the judiciary, but I do not know, and I have not heard it stated, the amount of money it is estimated will be received from this sort of taxation.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I can answer the gentleman. According to the Treasury estimates, it will bring in between four and a half and five million dollars.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if that be true, I do not believe that for that comparatively insignificant amount of money we ought to undertake this class of taxation, but we should see to it that some of the other schedules are revised and increased or new schedules added.

Mr. CRISP. I do not want to have any question as to what I mean by that statement. It is estimated by the Treasury officials that from the taxing of the salaries of the Federal and State officials between four and a half and five million dollars will be derived in revenue. That does not, of course, include anything that might come in from taxation of municipal and State bonds.

Mr. WALSH. That is another question; but my amendment goes to striking out the language within the parentheses, which affects the compensations or salaries of the President of the United States and Federal judges and State and municipal officials.

Mr. CRISP. The Treasury experts estimate that will yield between four and a half and five million dollars.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion that we should put this up to some official to contest it before the courts, I think, will not keep it out of the courts, and it ought not to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this paragraph ought to remain intact. I do not see why the test should not be made. It is an anomalous condition that a Federal officeholder receiving $7,500 a year shall be taxed upon that, and a State and county or municipal officeholder, living across the street and receiving as high as $17,500 a year, shall not be taxed. As a matter of principle in time if war it does not seem cowardly, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests, to undertake to reach that $17,500 man when the $7,500 man has to pay. What is there in the proposition as presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] except, in effect, to relieve from taxation those who are already fortunate enough to hold jobs in the county, State, or municipal service? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], who is an astute lawyer, along with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], raised the constitutional question, which, from a layman's point of view at least, seems to be answered by the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not wish the gentleman to infer that I desire to relieve anybody from taxation. My purpose is only that the United States shall be confined within its constitutional powers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman's argument thoroughly, and think the gentleman has been answered by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which gives Congress power to levy taxes upon income from "whatever source derived."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the gentleman recall that in the case of Collector against Day, where the United States undertook to tax the salary of a State official, the court held it unconstitutional?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not familiar with that particular case. I am not a lawyer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That was before the sixteenth amendment. Now, here is a decision after the sixteenth amendment, which says that no new subjects of taxation are contemplated, but that in so far as respects the power of laying income taxes the Constitution is now as it was before the acceptance of that amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can answer the gentleman's suggestion only by quoting the sixteenth amendment, which distinguished lawyers with whom I have discussed this matter agree covers the right of Congress now to levy taxes on State, county, and municipal officials. Let us read that amendment.

Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And will the gentleman permit me to read the decision of the Supreme Court passed on May 10 of this year which says that the taxing power was not extended to new or excepted subjects by provisions of the United States Constitution, sixteenth amendment, giving Congress the power to levy income taxes, but that such amendment merely removed all occasion, which otherwise might exist, for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on incomes, from whatever source derived?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can only recur to the amendment which is now a part of the Constitution, the purpose of which unquestionably, by reason of previous decisions of the Supreme Court, was to give Congress the power to levy taxes upon incomes. But dealing with the principle involved, that of taxing one man and exempting another man, why should such a hullabaloo have been raised throughout this country concerning the tax on Congressmen's salaries if the people had not understood that taxes should be equitable and uniform? The returns show that Members of Congress were probably the only 100 per cent taxpayers in any one of the occupations of the United States reported upon by the Treasury Department, yet because some one raised the question the country went wild over the suggestion that Congress had made a preference in its own favor. But nothing was said about the preference given to those who did not hold Federal offices and who are fortunate enough to hold offices in a State, in a county, or in a municipality. What did the returns show?

The other day in general debate I quoted from the Treasury Department statistics with regard to certain specified incomes showing that taxes were not generally collected from all the people of the United States, and in that showing I referred to the public service, civilian service, those employed under the auspices of the State, county, or municipality. I quoted the Treasury statistics. Now, I am glad to recur to those statistics, because some gentlemen thought I was referring particularly to the farmer, although that reference was only an incident to the general tax scheme. These statistics show that of public servants those who hold jobs under State, county, or municipality, there were 382,138, according to the census of 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Three hundred and eighty-two thousand one hundred and thirty-eight employees of State, county, and municipality, and of that number only 2,992, or seventy-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent made any income-tax return at all. Only seventy-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent of State, county, and municipal officeholders reported upon such incomes as they had exceeding their salaries. It seemed to me as unequal then as it does now. I can not understand why, in these war times, the mayor of a great city drawing $15,000 per annum or a city solicitor drawing $8,000 or $10,000 per annum should, when the Federal taxgatherer comes around to get money to prosecute the war, be able to say, "You can not touch me; I fall behind the Constitution. I am not to pay because I hold a job under the State, the county, or the municipality." I do not understand why, when there is a demand for money to prosecute this war, and the tax collector goes up to the governor of a great State, highly honored by the people, and says, "We would like a contribution for this war," he, too, should fall behind the Constitution and the State job. The fellow who holds a Federal office contributes to the financial burden of conducting this war. Why not the other officeholders? It seems inconsistent, gentlemen, to exact an income tax from farmers, merchants, manufacturers, and others and then say to the 382,000 men in the United States who are fortunate enough to hold civil places that they need not contribute to the expenses of war. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] and those who view this matter as he does present with great force the constitutional objections to this tax. Not long ago we passed the selective-draft bill, and out in various sections of the United States legal minds presented with great force their objection to the selective-draft bill upon the theory that it imposed an involuntary servitude upon some unwilling citizens of the United States. They carried that question through to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court decided that question as it ought to have been decided and as we all know it ought to have been decided. The real fight for the Constitution of the United States is being carried on to-day along the old Hindenburg line in northern France. The real fight for the Constitution of the United States, the fight that means something, is being made by our brave boys there as they face to-day the great guns firing at them from the ancient citadel of Metz. That is where the real fight is being made, and the real fight for the States and their rights is being made there, and the real fight of those citizens who draw salaries from the States is being made there. We are simply providing here in this bill for a war fund, and I have little sympathy with these hair-splitting discussions as to questions of constitutionality on this floor when the Nation's life is in peril. There will be enough objections to these taxes throughout the country; already a wave of objection to these high taxes is being started that will go higher and higher if you exempt citizens of the United States from this tax. It is a serious matter for a citizen of the United States to stand upon his constitutional rights and say, "I am mayor of a city. I draw a salary of $15,000 a year," or, "I am the treasurer of a State and my salary and my commissions amount, perhaps, to $50,000 a year." I understand there are even officials of some of our great cities who draw much higher salaries than this, and are they to say, "You can not destroy my city by taxing its officers. You have no right to destroy my city by taxing its officers." Great God, who is trying to destroy any city or any State by imposing these taxes! We propose to expend every two weeks during the next 12 months the sum of a billion dollars in money, and we have got to tax the people of the United States to get it, and we ought to tax them all equally. I would like to see the man, the official of a State or a city, who will have the courage to stand up and in effect say to his neighbors, "You are being taxed; a large portion of your income is being taken from you; you have elected me to this office, or the official you have elected has appointed me, and therefore my salary can not be touched; no matter what happens to me, I propose to go to the Supreme Court of the United States and have them say that my salary shall remain intact." We have exempted those officials in all the tax bills until the present time, and every man in this House, every Member on the floor, knows the result.

People who are being taxed are protesting from one end of this country to the other against omission of these citizens, who hold these lucrative positions, from taxes. They ought to be taxed; the ordinary rules which apply to the construction of statutes of this character in times of peace are not going to receive much sympathy in the Supreme Court of the United States. And it is our duty, as I see it, to leave this section as it is and to see that in this broad land no man can stand back of the Constitution and be a shirker and avoid paying taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, we travel far afield in our discussions of questions in committee, and it may be well to invite the attention of the committee back to what is the real question involved in the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. We have ranged into a discussion as to whether the President should be taxed and whether the judges should be taxed and whether municipal bonds should be taxed, but all of those subjects are covered by other portions of this measure. The only point raised by the gentleman from Virginia is by a motion to strike out the words "of any State," which limits this debate to the question, Ought Congress to tax the employees of a State or any subdivisions thereof under the form of raising revenue?

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman will permit, I suppose he wants to be accurate. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has offered an amendment to strike out the whole proposition.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia is quite right, and I thank him for the correction. My mind was absorbed in following the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. I rise to speak in reference to it. It is that the words "of any State" ought to be stricken out of this bill. It is not good argument to talk about who is fighting the fight of the Republic in answering a legal proposition like this. It is not good argument to appeal to prejudice and say that A gets a salary of $7,500 under a Federal office and B gets a salary of $17,500 under a State office, and that the former pays a tax and the latter does not. There is no use of becoming hysterical about waves of criticism flowing over this country. All that a Congressman has to do when considering a question of this kind is to endeavor to ascertain what is right, and let criticism take its course.

The question here is, What is right with reference to this amendment? It is not a question of raising a paltry sum of money. It involves a vital principle in the government of our country. It is a fundamental question and affects legislation in a most serious manner. I beg to recall to the gentleman that we are sworn to obey the Constitution. We have no right to shift the exercise of the first judgment away from ourselves. This body is a court in the sense that it must for itself pass upon every question of constitutionality that is raised, and that we must not in a cowardly fashion shrink from that duty. It may be more popular to say that we are going to tax the salaries of everybody. Let us be true to what we have pledged ourselves, and stand by the fundamental principles established for the government of our country and our Nation. We ought not even in the hysteria of war times to trample them under foot.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I decline to be interrupted.

The language of the gentleman from Virginia clearly marks out the accurate interpretation of the sixteenth amendment of the Constitution. No new powers of taxation have been conferred by it, says the Supreme Court. We must inquire what was the evil intended to be cured when this amendment was adopted, and then see what is the remedy that has been applied. The evil that was sought to be overcome was the difficulty of making these taxes on incomes without an apportionment among the several States. The legislatures of the States in ratifying this amendment to the Constitution came back with the answer, "We will remove that difficulty," and the reading of the amendment shows that that was the difficulty that was to be removed. But they did not come back and say by ambiguous language that "we have surrendered the sovereignty of a State." This means the surrender of the sovereignty of a State if pursued to its final conclusion. They simply said that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever sources derived without"—and that is the gist of the amendment—"without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or any enumeration."

It will take a powerful argument to convince a court passing upon a question like that that in this harmless phraseology it was ever intended that the sovereign right of the State should be put down and destroyed and a power conferred that never before had been exercised or never was thought of as one that could be exercised. The amendment simply means this and nothing more. Prior to this amendment it was unconstitutional to levy taxes upon the salaries of State officials. This amendment simply says income taxes may be now laid without apportionment among the several States, but it never increased the subjects of taxation or said that you could tax the officials of a State, which had been declared to be an unconstitutional exercise of power before this amendment was passed.

Now, one word with reference to the question of the President's salary and the judicial salaries. There is no provision in the Constitution of the United States affecting salaries other than those of the President and the judges of our courts. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] touched the sciatic nerve of that situation when he addressed the question to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I am not here to advocate that the passage of this bill would be a diminution of the salary of the President or the salary of the judges, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition, for I can not argue on that side of that question. But I would strike out the tax upon the President and upon the judges upon a higher ground even than that. It would be upon the ethical ground that we have no right to put a clause in this bill which practically debars the judges from passing upon it, for they are interested parties; and likewise the President of the United States who must, in the exercise of his power to veto in acting upon this bill, be also an interested party. I say we ought to preserve the old landmarks and, as we have heretofore done, exclude the President of the United States and the judges of the courts from the laying or the levying of an income tax upon their salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CANNON. How much more time would the gentleman like?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Three minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The real question with reference, therefore, to the salaries of these high officials is not, in my judgment, so much the constitutional question as it is a question of ethical right for us to put these people, who must sit in judgment upon this bill, who are the judges, in a position where they will no longer be disinterested actors upon it. That is the question that appeals to me.

Now, one more word with regard to the States. The question regarding the striking out of the words "any State" is fundamental. It is a basis that we should not depart from. It is innovating in legislation in a most dangerous fashion to depart from that basis, and it does put upon the officeholder what my friend from Massachusetts calls a cowardly condition. You are going to force him, in order to defend his legal rights in time of war, to go into a court of justice and claim his legal rights when the danger of the mad cry that goes up everywhere prevents the operation of fair play and the statement would be made, "He is a slacker to defend himself against the payment of a tax on that salary." If we believe it is right, levy the tax. But if we as men believe it is wrong, let us refuse to levy the tax.

The question of taxing municipal bonds comes largely under this same question which is raised by the effort to tax the salaries of individuals in the service of the respective States. If you can tax the municipal bonds of a State, you may deprive it of the power to exist. You can destroy the autonomy of the States by taxation. The man will have a wild theory to sustain who will ever endeavor to maintain the proposition that the sixteenth amendment was intended to clothe the Congress with the power to disintegrate and to destroy statehood in the Nation and put it in the power of Congress to wipe out the lines that were so carefully marked by our fathers as tending to preserve the welfare of this country and make this simply a centralized power, with everything in Washington, and with no reserved rights or duties in the States themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, if the State and Federal Governments may each tax the official salaries and bonds of the other, they may mutually destroy each other. It was in view of that situation that the courts have held that such taxes are unconstitutional and fundamentally out of harmony with our system of government and can not be laid. That was the reason for that line of decisions.

No such difficulty applies to incomes derived from salaries or from interest on bonds which are not taxed as such. I have no doubt that a Federal income tax directed specifically to the salary of a State official would be void as unconstitutional. I have no doubt that if the Federal Government should undertake to lay a tax specifically upon interest derived from State bonds, it would be unconstitutional. But the distinction must be made between such taxes as those I have mentioned and a tax laid equally upon all sources of income without an exemption in favor of interest on State bonds and salaries of State officials.

Now, that is the very heart of the question under discussion. The proposition advocated by the amendments is to so change this bill as to afford an exemption to State officials. That is this proposition. The other side of the proposition is to levy a tax upon all incomes without any exemption. It is not specifically aimed at interest on State bonds. Nor is it aimed at the salaries of State officials. But it is aimed at all incomes, from whatever source. It is merely a way of fixing the amount that each citizen, without regard to his occupation or the source of his income, shall pay toward the support of the Government. I do not think if I argued the point for an hour I could express myself more clearly upon it.

Just one thing more. With reference to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] as to the ethical question. He begs that we do not put up to our courts the legal question to decide whether they shall pay their part toward carrying on this war. Why, the same ethical question, I will say to him, is put up to every Member of Congress. Why should the courts of the land be exempt from passing upon such a delicate question when we here in this House must pass upon it in connection with our own incomes and say what part we shall do toward paying for the war? I have no sympathy with the suggestion made by the gentleman, that a sense of delicacy on our part should cause us to put aside from the Supreme Court of the United States the responsibility of saying that they shall or not be exempt from this tax, whereas we who pass this law say that we shall not be exempt.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would not rise to take part in this debate on the constitutional question were it not for the fact that the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has passed upon almost this identical question in construing a similar clause of the State constitution which forbade the compensation of any public officer being increased or diminished during his term, as to the effect of the income-tax law passed under a later constitutional amendment.

The case is State ex rel. Wickham v. Tygaard (159 Wis. Reports, 396), decided January 12, 1915. There a circuit judge contested the right to include under the State income tax his salary as judge, where his term had begun prior to the enactment of the income-tax amendment. There was a provision in the original constitution forbidding the legislature from reducing or increasing the compensation of any public official during his term of office. In 1908 an amendment to the State constitution was adopted which authorized the levy of income taxes in the following language:

> Taxes may also be imposed upon incomes, privileges, and occupations, which taxes may be graduated and progressive, and reasonable exemptions may be provided.

The State supreme court, in a decision rendered by Mr. Justice Barnes, an eminent jurist, who has since resigned from the State supreme court to take the position of general counsel of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., held that the question was largely one of construction, and that the two clauses must be taken together. And in passing upon it the court upheld the right of the State to levy the income tax upon the salaries of public officials, even though that tax diminished in effect the salaries of those officials.

Mr. Justice Barnes, at page 402, says:

> We construe the amendment as authorizing the legislature to tax incomes in any case where the power rests in the State to impose such a tax. It would not be contended that the Constitution might not be amended so as to abrogate section 26 of Article IV entirely. Neither would it be contended, if the amendment of 1908 had in express terms stated that salaries of public officers should be subject to an income tax, that so much of section 26 of Article IV as prohibited the levy of such tax would not be abrogated, assuming that it did prohibit the imposition of a tax on salaries of public officers. The real question is one of construction involving the comprehensiveness of the 1908 amendment. The language is broad and sweeping, making and containing no exception. Both constitutional provisions are somewhat general in their nature. As applied to the right to tax incomes of State officers, section 26 of Article IV is no more specific than is the amendment of 1908. Hardly as much so. The latter says taxes may be "imposed on incomes." We perceive very little room for construction, and if a doubtful question were involved it should not be resolved against the exercise of the taxing power of the State.

So with the National Government, under Article XVI, Congress by amendment to the Constitution is authorized to levy taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States. Here also it is a question of construction, whether this amendment supersedes the restriction in the original Constitution that the salary of the President shall neither be increased or diminished or that the salary of judges shall not be diminished during their terms of office.

If the sixteenth amendment is to receive a narrow construction, that merely lifts the power ban of apportioning such income taxes, then the authority to include such salaries is most questionable. But if full effect is given to the words "from whatever source derived," this being a general provision and later in its enactment, it would supersede the earlier and authorize the levy on such salaries.

I have greater doubt on the question suggested by the amendment the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], as it involves the power of the National Government to affect directly the instrumentality of the States. Again the question arises, What is the full purport of the sixteenth amendment?

And in that very decision the question arose of the delicacy of submitting to the justices, as advanced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], the duty of passing upon a question that would affect their own salaries, and the Supreme Court dismisses that by saying that any number of times questions come up as to the constitutionality of legislation affecting the taxation of property, the taxation of insurance policies, and the like, in which the individual Members are in a way interested by reason of being owners of property or holders of insurance, and yet they assume the duty of passing upon those questions. And it is never considered that such remote interest would be a bar to the justices passing upon the constitutionality of the question because of their financial interest.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman say that a judge of the United States Court, in passing upon the question as to whether his salary was subject to taxation under this income-tax law would be passing upon a question in which he had a "remote" interest?

Mr. STAFFORD. No more than in the case cited by Justice Barnes in the Wisconsin Supreme Court, that a question relating to the taxation of property in general would not disqualify him from passing upon it. It was not such a disqualifying interest as made the judges of that court shirk the responsibility of their position.

Mr. WALSH. But in this case it is a specific levy upon a specific schedule of taxation.

Mr. STAFFORD. And in the very question that was up for decision before the Wisconsin Supreme Court the question was whether the income-tax law that applied to the salaries of circuit judges and supreme court judges removed the question from the range of their passing upon it because they had a direct interest, and the supreme court said in that decision that they assumed the responsibility which they owed to the public to pass upon that question. And I want to call the attention of the member of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WALSH] to this decision. I grant that the phraseology of the income-tax provision of Wisconsin is different from the amendment to the United States Constitution under Article XVI, but the decision cited by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] in the case of Peck against Lowe, decided May 20 last, does not stand on all fours in prohibiting this Congress from levying an income tax on the salaries of public officials, certainly not those of the National Government, because in that very decision the Supreme Court said that the sixteenth amendment, although referred to in argument, has no real bearing and may be put out of view, showing conclusively that the Supreme Court did not intend to pass upon the question as to the relative construction of the proposal of taxing salaries of judges or public officials in construing the income-tax provision of the sixteenth amendment with that provision of the original Constitution which forbade the changing of the salary of a justice of the courts of the United States or the salary of the President during his term of office. This question has not been put up to the Supreme Court for decision.

Since war was declared we have heard much as to the war powers of Congress. We know that the Constitution has been stretched almost to the breaking point to justify some of the legislation that has been passed by Congress, and we expect the Supreme Court to uphold, as the Supreme Court has upheld, legislation of that kind, because we are at war and because it was construed as being part of the war powers of Congress.

Now, in view of this decision, where the Supreme Court of Wisconsin passed upon almost this identical question, can we not say that there is warrant for legislative action in believing this authority constitutional, and in submitting this question to the Supreme Court to determine whether we have authority under the sixteenth amendment to levy a tax on the incomes of Federal and State officials, as we are levying taxes indiscriminately upon all officials, whether private or public?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] ought to be defeated. In my judgment, the committee have taken the only wise course that could be taken, in view of the doubt which must exist as to the power of Congress upon this subject.

The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] proposes to strike out everything in parentheses, beginning in line 18 on page 8 and extend to the end of the parentheses, on line 24, page 8. The words are:

> (Including in the case of the President of the United States, the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States, and all other officers and employees, whether elected or appointed, of the United States, or of any State, Alaska, Hawaii, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, the compensation received as such.)

The amendment embraces three propositions, with three different degrees of constitutional questions. In the first place, it embraces the salary of the President of the United States and the salaries of the Federal judiciaries. The Federal Constitution covers those cases by providing that the salary of the President shall neither be increased nor diminished during his term of office. and that the salaries of the Federal judiciary shall not be diminished during their term of office.

Apparently the first time that it was attempted to tax the salaries of the United States judiciary was in the act of 1864. No decision was rendered upon that act; but that act, as I understand, provided for no exception in favor of the Federal judiciary.

Black on Income Taxes, section 205, says:

The income-tax laws enacted by Congress during the period of the Civil War contain no such exception, but the justices of the Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Taney, addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, declaring their conviction that their salaries were not legally subject to the tax. Thereupon the Attorney General, to whom the communication had been referred, gave an elaborate opinion, advising the Secretary of the Treasury that the income tax could not lawfully be assessed upon and collected from the salaries of those judicial officers of the United States who were in office at the time of the enactment of the act imposing the tax.

So that it was upon the opinion of the Attorney General, through the Secretary of the Treasury, that the actual omission was made, and apparently no decision has been rendered by any court upon the subject, whether a tax upon the salary of the Federal judiciary reduces or diminshes that salary within the meaning of the Federal Constitution.

Now, I am inclined to agree with the interpretation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that the object of this provision in the case of the President of the United States and of the Federal judiciary was to prevent Congress from either rewarding or punishing the President, or punishing the Federal judiciary, by the enactment of special legislation directed against them to reduce their salaries during their continuance in office. That was a very familiar practice of parliament, and was undoubtedly in the minds of the framers of our Constitution at the time the Constitution was framed. So far as we are able to ascertain it was not designed to exempt these officials from the ordinary burdens that they would bear as citizens of the Republic. I am inclined to think that the Federal Supreme Court will hold eventually that any burden which is common to the citizens of the Republic in a like situation must be borne by the Federal judiciary and by the President of the United States, notwithstanding these protecting clauses of the Federal Constitution. The only thing that Congress is forbidden to do is to single out the President for reward or punishment during his continuance in office, or to single out the Federal judges for punishment during their continuance in office.

Now, that presents so doubtful a question that in my mind it ought to defeat the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. As to the question of power to tax the State, a stronger constitutional doubt exists. That is the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. My recollection is—I have not the case before me—that the case of McCulloch against Maryland, in which Chief Justice Marshall delivered the celebrated opinion, was a case where the officials of the city of Baltimore sought to levy a tax against the United States bank. It was held that notwithstanding the failure of the Constitution to expressly exempt the instrumentalities of the State from Federal taxation that neither the State nor the Federal Government could tax the instrumentalities of the other; that it was interwoven with the whole scheme of political control in this country that the two sovereigns were of equal power, each within its sphere, and neither one could invade the sphere of the other, and neither one could lay the hand of taxation on the activities of the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. That broad principle that neither under the guise of taxation nor under the guise of regulation can either one of the sovereigns invade the field of activity or instrumentalities of the other, if that be confirmed again it will do all that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia seeks.

But the intervening fact now is that the sixteenth amendment provides that incomes may be taxed by the Federal Government from whatever source derived. Those words "from whatever source derived" introduce a legal element which was not present at the time this long line of decisions was made, not when the McCulloch against Maryland case was decided, nor in the cases that followed that leading case.

Therefore a new legal element has come into existence which ought to be affirmatively and authoritatively decided by the court.

As to the third proposition embraced in the gentleman's amendment, to exempt officials of the territory of the United States, he has absolutely no justification. His amendment on two grounds at least is unsound. On the whole proposition the committee has chosen in this hour of the Nation's need the only wise and proper course, and that is to tax all that we reasonably have the right to tax, and if there be exemptions in the Constitution of the United States let an authoritative decision be rendered on those exemptions.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. WALSH In reference to the gentleman's concluding statement there is nothing left to tax that is exempted by the Constitution. I want to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand, the Supreme Court in 1862 or 1863 directed attention to the fact that the revenue law at that time could not tax their salaries, and it was subsequent to that in a communication the Attorney General advised the Treasury Department that they were not subject to taxation.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman imagine how the Supreme Court would have decided that question if it had been presented to it squarely?

Mr. BORLAND. I can. The membership of that court, I believe, would have decided that they were not subject to taxation.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that if we decrease the salary of the President and do not do it to punish him that we can do it legally?

Mr. BORLAND. I am inclined to think that any law Congress passes which places an income tax or any other form of tax applying universally to all citizens of the United States is constitutional, and that in order to come within the constitutional inhibition it must be a law applying to the President of the United States, singling him out.

Mr. WALSH. And this does.

Mr. BORLAND. No; it applies to incomes, and it says including the income of these officials. It applies to all the citizens of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. But he is the only President.

Mr. BORLAND. It applies to every citizen of the United States; it is neither a reward nor a punishment. Suppose we should pass a law saying that the President of the United States shall pay an income tax of $24,700. Then, after he was out of office and a new President came in, we passed another law repealing that tax. Have we increased the emoluments of the President of the United States by the sum of $24,700? No; it is neither an increase nor a diminution in the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman does not consider an income tax in so far as it allows the general taxing of incomes affects the prior provision of the Constitution about reducing salaries.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not; I think the prior opinion was not well considered.

Mr. DENISON. I am not talking about the prior opinion, but the prior provision of the Constitution.

Mr. BORLAND. The opinion of Chief Justice Tawney was not a judicial opinion, and it might have been otherwise if it was. I think, however, there is grave doubt about the power to tax the instrumentalities of a State.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] in what he said and all that he said touching the constitutional power to enact this legislation in this provision of the bill. I agree substantially and heartily with what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] said. In the short time I have to speak about this amendment and the provisions of the bill, I shall talk, perhaps, more about the policy than I shall about the power.

I believe that we are without power under the Constitution to decrease or increase the salary of the President of the United States during his term; and while it may be that he would sign the bill with that in it, and while it might be possible that he would donate from his salary an amount equal to the tax, if we did not subject him to the tax—and no doubt he does have many donations to make—yet what is the sense of reducing the salary of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy when he is taxed now more severely than any other President ever was taxed except in time of war. It is just peanut politics, in my judgment, and flying in the face of the express provision in the Constitution that the salary of the President and the Federal judges shall not be decreased during their term of office. If you can tax to take one dollar you can tax to take every cent. If you can decrease the President's salary in substance by applying the so-called income-tax provision, then you can take it all. Gentlemen will recall that at the time of the whisky rebellion, when Washington had to intervene and put it down and enforce the law, there were propositions made to impeach the President and the judges deciding the case, and to take their salary, and all that kind of thing. That is a coordinate branch of the Government and this is a coordinate branch of the Government, and one or the other or the two together coordinate branches have not the power, in my judgment, or the right, and if they had it would not be decent, from my standpoint, to exercise it to destroy the other coordinate branch of the Government, the courts. So much for that.

It is said that nobody is as cowardly as one Member of Congress except two Members of Congress. To a certain degree that is true, and I include myself, so that I am not criticizing any Representative on the floor of this House without taking my due share of criticism. We are very touchy from the popular standpoint. Gentlemen will recall, when we were considering the draft bill a short time ago, that in Committee of the Whole we adopted an amendment to subject Members of Congress to the draft. It went through. We adjourned and got our heads a little clear overnight, and we concluded that perhaps we could survive the attacks that the demagogues might make on us, as the election was approaching, upon the ground that we had protected ourselves from the draft; and when we came to consider that vote in the House we did not agree with the Committee of the Whole House, though I believe there was no yea-and-nay vote.

However, we turned down the proposition that went through in Committee of the Whole House. Finally we are relieved from the attacks of demagogues by the Provost Marshal General issuing an order, or a letter, for the information of all the world, that the only way a Member of Congress can subject himself to the draft is by resigning. I expect he is right, because if all of us were to resign the result would be that a coordinate branch of the Government would be destroyed, at least temporarily. One gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that we tax ourselves on the $7,500 that we receive. Perhaps there is nothing in the Constitution to keep us from raising or lowering our salaries during our term of office. There is nothing there that would keep us from raising or lowering the salaries. Possibly, so far as compensation is concerned, we might reduce our own salaries or increase them, and I suppose we could tax them. I am not objecting to the tax, so far as that is concerned; but that is no argument why, in the face of the Constitution, as made by one or more Members on this floor, we should rush in and tax the salary of some one else.

Because we tax our own salaries is no reason why we should violate the Constitution in reducing the salary of the President and the judges, something expressly forbidden.

Gentlemen say that they are anxious to get this question decided. This bill is to raise $8,000,000,000, and if we pass this provision we are told about $4,000,000, or a little more, will be brought into the Treasury, and we are awfully anxious to put it up to the judges to pass upon the question, so that we can settle it! There is time enough to settle it, if you want to, by additional amendments to the Constitution, provided they can be ratified; and we can do that in the piping times of peace without raising this question, not, in my judgment, to get real relief for the Treasury, but to place coordinate branches of the Government in embarrassing positions, so that we might go to the country and say, Oh, we did this and that and the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Nobody can talk about this subject in 5 or 10 minutes, and I am not the most competent man to talk about it anyway. I do not know that I could advise others how to vote. I have frequently found difficulty in counseling myself on how I ought to vote and what I ought to do, and certainly I should take more time than I shall take about this matter if I were counseling others. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] by way of substitute. If that is adopted, I shall then vote for the amendment. If it is voted down, I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

You take my house when you do take
The prop that doth sustain my house.

That was true when Shakespeare put that sentence into the mouth of Portia in the trial of Shylock, and it is true now. Good morals, good law, demand that we do not do this thing. We should not in this time of war and great trouble, for a negligible amount of money, put it up to a coordinate branch to decide whether they should submit to this—whether their set salaries should be taxed. In the time of Chief Justice Taney, a Democratic judge, when the proposition was to tax the salaries of the Federal judges, when he was opposed practically to coercing a sovereign State when the great war was upon us, and all he had to do was to write a letter to the Attorney General saying that he was satisfied that Congress had no power to levy that tax, and the Congress then, in the stress of that great contest for the preservation of the Union, did not wait for the formal decision, but omitted the legislation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who has just addressed us referred to the whisky rebellion. That rebellion was waged in the State of Pennsylvania and was caused by reason of a tax placed on whisky by the first revenue bill passed by Congress. It was waged because the people at that time honestly believed that a tax on whisky was unconstitutional. They believed that whisky was a necessity of life, and a prime necessity. They were honest and earnest in their objection. It is a long way from the opinion existing at that time to the opinion existing now with reference to the right to tax whisky. So, too, may it be said that many things which were believed honestly by men to be unconstitutional at the time of Chief Justice Taney are no longer believed to be unconstitutional but that they are now quite constitutional. I wish to answer the suggestion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] with reference to the assumption of measures passed by the Congress being constitutional. It does not follow because there may be some question concerning the constitutionality of a measure that we should refuse to pass it, for if such a rule obtained very few measures of importance would ever pass either body of this Congress.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not the assumption also that every gentleman who votes for that law believes that it is constitutional?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; but he does not have to believe it to the nicety of a certainty. If that were so, we would not have progressed one inch from the attitude occupied 140 years ago at the beginning of this Government of the United States; and where would this Government of ours have been now? We would not have had the northwest territory, would not have had California and all of that section. We would not have had Alaska. The acquirement of these were all unconstitutional in the minds of many statesmen when their acquirement was being discussed in this body. So that I say that in these progressive times that when there may be a doubt with regard to the constitutionality of a question, unless that doubt is so strong in our mind we would not feel free to act upon it in a matter of our dearest concern, we should act.

I agree we should be very careful in passing on questions of this character, but I do not believe that every time there is a doubt expressed whether or not a measure is constitutional that we should hesitate to act unless that doubt resolves itself into such strong conviction that we are convinced to a certainty of the unconstitutionality of the measure proposed. Now, I have no doubt in my mind with regard to the constitutionality of this provision, and I do not believe that it is extending the power of taxation. If it is not extending the power of taxation, then the argument of the gentleman from Virginia falls. I do not believe that any one here will seriously contend that this tax levied upon the salary of the President of the United States and the salaries of the justices of the United States is a diminution of their salaries. If that were to be so it would be incumbent upon the Congress of the United States to provide some sort of scheme whereby the purchasing power of a dollar would remain the same throughout their terms of office. No one will say that the salary of the President of the United States to-day is as great in purchasing power as it was before this war commenced. No one will contend for a minute that the purchasing value of the salaries of the justices of the United States is as great to-day by half as as it was at the time of the commencement of this war. If the Constitution had intended that the salary of the President of the United States should not be taxed it would have said so. [Applause.] If the Constitution had intended that the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States should not be taxed it would have said so. Taxation is simply a burden of citizenship that should fall upon all alike. Is the President of the United States because he is President relieved of the burdens of citizenship, or are the judges of the United States courts, because they are selected as judges, relieved of the burdens of citizenship? I do not believe that anybody will seriously contend that there can be a question as to the legality of this tax for the reason that it reduces the salary of this class to which it is made to apply. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire accord with the position of the gentleman from Virginia as to the question of the taxation of the salaries of State officers. The salaries of State officers are fixed by jurisdiction entirely beyond our control. If we tax their salaries to such an extent as to impair their efficiency, why we have no power to make that up. Now, when it comes to taxing the salaries of United States officers and United States judges, if Congress by taxation finds it has impaired the efficiency of its own agencies it can repair that, but when it comes to dealing with the salaries of State officials it can not do so, and I will give an instance of it. In the Supreme Court of South Carolina justices are elected once every two years for 10 years. Say a justice has been just elected, and the provision of the constitution is that his salary can not be increased during his term. We pass a salary-increase law next winter, and he gets $3,000—we pass a law to increase his salary next winter, and it could not begin to affect him until he has served nine more years and then is reelected, and so you see you begin to get into a realm beyond our control.

You will do a great injustice to the State in doing so, but that does not apply, of course, to the tax of Federal officials. I am inclined to think—I am a little doubtful of the propriety of it—I am in favor of the provision for taxing the incomes of Federal officials, including incomes from salaries. Now, the decision cited by the gentleman from Virginia, while good, is not exactly in point on this question, but it is backed up by cases which he has cited. It is an obiter dictum so far as that is concerned, because they say that the sixteenth amendment to-day referred to in argument has no real bearing, but it refers to the case of Brushaber, Two hundred and fortieth United States, 1, and that case, it seems to me, together with the case cited by the gentleman from Virginia, shows that on this question there has been no receding from the position that was taken by the court years ago up to this time in the matter of the taxing of State instrumentalities. It can scarcely be controverted that the sixteenth amendment has not undertaken to deal with that at all. The question there is dealt with on the proposition that the right to tax everything already existed and, therefore, that the sixteenth amendment had nothing to do with it. The following is the language:

> The various propositions are so intermingled as to cause it to be difficult to classify them. We are of opinion, however, that the confusion is not inherent, but rather arises from the conclusion that the sixteenth amendment provides for a hitherto unknown power of taxation; that is, a power to levy an income tax which although direct should not be subject to the regulation of apportionment applicable to all other direct taxes.

And then they go on and say that the sixteenth amendment has added nothing to the power to lay and collect income taxes. If it has not, then the decision which was made long before this amendment was adopted settles the fact that you can not tax State instrumentalities and you can not, therefore, invade the domain of State legislation. And it seems, therefore, conclusive that it has been decided that the sixteenth amendmen in nowise abrogates the fact that you can not tax the salaries of State officials or the bonds of a State or State subdivisions or interest arising from them as part of the income. That having been thoroughly decided, it seems there is no answer to the position of the gentleman from Virginia that the words "or of any State" should be stricken out.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I just desire to say one word with reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

I do not think this legislation is unconstitutional with reference to taxing the salary of the President and the salaries of the judges on the ground that it is a diminution of their salaries during their term of office. It was certainly the intention, and I think it has always been so understood and construed to mean, that Congress could not by direct legislation increase or reduce the salaries of the Federal officials during their term.

Now, the ethical question raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] does not appeal to me. To say that we ought not to pass this legislation because it would put the President and the judges of the Supreme Court in an embarrassing position is certainly not an argument against this legislation. Why, if we are going to decline to pass legislation simply because it affects the President or the presidential office, or the judges of the Supreme Court, on the ground that they must act upon it by way of veto or by way of passing on the constitutionality of the legislation, then we abandon our constitutional right and we shirk our constitutional duties to pass any legislation affecting those officers or the offices which they occupy. So we can not say that because it will embarrass them to pass upon the questions which we think ought to be incorporated into the law we ought not to incorporate them.

Now, I confess I do not know what the Supreme Court will say about the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. I do not know whether we have the constitutional power to levy an income tax on the salaries of State officials or not, and I do not think anybody will know until the Supreme Court has passed upon it. I am of the opinion that we have the power to do what this bill proposes, but I have doubts whether the court will so hold. There are a great many legal propositions that are unsettled, and we can get the opinions of good lawyers on one side and the opinions of good lawyers on the other side; but those questions are determined only when the Supreme Court passes upon them. Let us remember that since the question was decided by the Supreme Court, since it was held that Congress had not the constitutional power to levy a tax on State bonds and the salaries of State officials there have been two changes, both radical and important. The Constitution has been changed, providing for an income tax from any and every source whatever. Now, that is one change that has been made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman inform me when was the latest decision?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I do not know. But there has been no decision since the Constitution was amended.

The other change is the change in the Supreme Court itself. I doubt if there is a single man on the bench of the Supreme Court to-day that was there when the decision was rendered, although I can not give you just the date when it was rendered.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it was around about the year 1870.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I know it was a long time ago. I have not looked at the latest decision, but I know what the general trend of decisions has been on that subject. If the gentleman from Ohio is right, and I think he is, the Supreme Court has been entirely changed since the courts so held in 1870. Whatever the Supreme Court decides binds everybody except the court itself. It can change its construction of the Constitution at any time. The law made by the Supreme Court binds everybody but the Supreme Court. The court is not bound to-day by the decision of 25 years ago. This is a mooted question, and it is highly important as a matter of public policy that it be decided and determined definitely. The only way we can get it determined definitely is to pass it to the courts. It is a question of public policy whether a private citizen should be taxed and the public official go tax free, and it is a serious question. It ought to be decided by the Supreme Court, and it is within our power now to put it in shape for submission or to prevent its submission.

Now, gentlemen, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said something about the policy and the purpose of this legislation. The Supreme Court of the United States is influenced on questions of this kind by the law of public policy, and it ought to be so influenced. Where a constitution is susceptible of two constructions, it will inquire what sound public policy dictates in the premises. That which was good public policy 30 or 40 years ago might not be good public policy now. We have changed and we have progressed, and our institutions have changed from year to year, and the laws and regulations that were suited to them half a century ago might not be suited to them now. The Supreme Court, as it ought to do, has always taken cognizance of the changes in society and the changes in our institutions. I doubt very much whether they would say to-day that it was good policy to tax a private citizen of the United States and leave go untaxed the man that is drawing a larger salary or getting a larger income from the Public Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by offering the following:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to modify the substitute he has offered. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the modification of the original substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 8, line 18, after the word "service" and before the word "including," insert the word "not"; and, in line 21, strike out the word "other"; and, in line 22, strike out the words "of the United States or"; and also, in the same line, the words "Alaska, Hawaii"; and, in line 23, strike out the words "or the District of Columbia," so that it will read "not including in the case of the President of the United States, the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States, and all other officers and employees, whether elected or appointed, of any State or political subdivision thereof, the compensation received as such."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has 20 minutes, as I understand.

Mr. CRISP. I will propound my inquiry later.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we have 20 minutes after the 3 minutes.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that while there is considerable doubt as to the constitutionality of taxing State officials' and of taxing Federal judges' or the President's salaries, we find the fact before us that there is considerable doubt on the question; we find able lawyers on either side taking opposite views, some saying it is constitutional and some saying it is unconstitutional, and giving their reasons for their view. The reason I vote for this provision is that since there is such considerable doubt, especially since the adoption of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, which uses the words "Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment," I believe it would be well to have the matter tested and decided. Some take the position that if Congress simply wanted to get rid of the apportionment in submitting this amendment, and the States, in ratifying it, had simply wanted to tax the income which the Congress had the power to tax with apportionment, and tax it now without apportionment, it would not have been necessary for Congress to have used the words "from whatever source derived"; but it would have used this language, that "Congress shall have the power to levy and collect taxes on incomes without apportionment." If the people who ratified the amendment desired to have the construction placed upon it which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and others have given to it, Congress would have used those words and would not have inserted the additional words "from whatever source derived."

I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania has somewhat changed his opinion since May 6, 1913, because at that time he offered an amendment striking out from the income-tax section the salary exemption of the President and the judges and the State officials, when he said that that question ought to be tested, and he wanted these very provisions to go into the law so that the Supreme Court could have an opportunity to test them and settle the question forever.

Now, I take that position. I have considerable doubt about it, and I am reluctant to vote for it; but I stand with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], a great and learned lawyer. He said on May 6, 1913:

Mr. Chairman, it was my impression that there was no adjudication of this question, and it seems to me that it is clear that the Congress of the United States has power to impose an income tax and affect even these gentlemen. I would like to see the question raised and tested, because this classification is not an agreeable one.

The gentlemen he refers to are the President of the United States, the Supreme Court justices, and the State officials. Then he added:

I therefore present the following amendment to this section.

That amendment reads as follows:

Page 137, line 1, after the word "taxation," strike out the words "also the compensation of the present President of the United States during the term for which he has been elected and of the judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts of the United States now in office, and the compensation of all officers and employees of a State or any political subdivision thereof."

This committee has taken the gentleman's suggestion, the suggestion made by the distinguished gentleman and lawyer from Pennsylvania [applause], and I am voting for this upon the same principle upon which the gentleman offered that amendment; now, since the constitutional amendment declares that Congress shall have the power to levy and collect taxes on the income to be derived from any source whatever; we can not settle it; we have not the power to settle it. No power in the world can settle it except the Supreme Court of the United States. Let us raise it, as we have done, and let it be tested, and it can only be done by some one protesting his tax and taking an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I said to-day, in discussing this question, that so far as the salary of the President and the salary of the judges were concerned, I could not argue against its constitutionality because I did not hold that belief. I am consistent. To-day I did say, however, that they ought not, either of them, be put in the position of being practically disqualified from passing upon this bill. The President has to pass upon it by his veto. The judges have to pass upon it with relation to their own salaries. Now, the great Committee on Ways and Means, it seems, has taken the liberty of changing its mind. Surely I, an humble Member, may be permitted to qualify my remarks of that date to the extent that I think it is ethically unsound. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. But the gentleman ought not to impeach the committee for following him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not. They do not follow me. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I wish I were the Pied Piper of Hamelin. If I were, I would pipe and take the committee with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. At that time the committee was wrong and the gentleman was right. We are right now and he is wrong.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; I am still right, but the committee have changed their minds.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think really that every man who has a doubt about this can very well vote for it and take the advice of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which was sound then and is sound now, that this question ought to be raised by Congress, the only power that can raise it, in order that it may be tested in the Supreme Court, the only power that can decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Is not the amendment divisible, containing two substantive propositions, one exempting from the purview of the law State officials and the other part exempting Federal officials?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands as a matter of precedent that this amendment in the nature of a substitute is not divisible.

Mr. CRISP. Does it not contain two substantive propositions?

The CHAIRMAN. Apparently it does.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a parliamentary inquiry? I want to inquire if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] obtained the unanimous consent that I understood him to request; that is, to withdraw his original proposition and offer this other as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that has been done.

Mr. CRISP. I have not the precedent at hand, but I recall distinctly that the Speaker held that an amendment even containing five or six distinct substantive propositions was divisible, and that a vote could be had upon each substantive proposition. Without detaining the House or burdening the Chair, it seems to me that certainly this amendment contains two distinct propositions—one whether State officials shall be subject to this income tax and the other whether Federal officials shall be subject to it. I rose to ask that the amendment be divided, and that the vote be taken separately upon each one of those substantive propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to ask the attention of the Chair to Rule XVI, clause 6:

On the demand of any Member, before the question is put, the question shall be divided if it includes propositions so distinct in substance that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain.

Mr. CRISP. After conference I withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he is familiar with the rule to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers, and further that there would appear to be two substantive propositions and possibly more, in his substitute; but the precedents of the House are that a substitute in the nature of an amendment to an amendment, is not divisible. The Chair will not undertake to argue the reasons underlying these precedents, but will simply refer to the ruling found in section 6127, Volume V of Hinds' Precedents to the following effect:

Substitute resolutions offered as an amendment are not divisible.

This would seem to be decisive of the request for a division of the substitute. The question is on the substitute in the nature of an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 17, noes 77.

Accordingly, the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MONTAGUE) there were—ayes 32, noes 72.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Does not include the following items, which shall be exempt from taxation under this title.

(1) The proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the insured to individual beneficiaries or to the estate of the insured.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORES of Indiana offers the following amendment: Page 9, line 15, after the word "to," strike out the word "individual."

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offer this amendment is that the act as drafted and amended provides for the taxation of life insurance carried in favor of corporations. You will pardon me if I explain the nature of that insurance. The larger corporations, the great corporations, do not carry this kind of life insurance. Ninety-nine out of 100 corporations in this country are small corporations, commonly called family corporations, where, for instance, one man who knows the business of manufacturing or of mining or of trading in which the corporation is engaged, with possibly inadequate capital, gets another man who will finance it, usually a relative of the man promoting the corporation, for the conduct of the business. The mercantile agencies, Dun's and Bradstreet, the Federal reserve banks, and all other institutions of that kind require reports from partnerships, individuals, and all corporations as to insurance carried. Insurance is carried and almost compelled to be carried for this reason. If the wealthy man, the angel who finances the concern, dies it could not be financed, because he could not get credit from the bank. If the man who conducts the business should die the wealthy man who has furnished the capital must find some other man to run the business. This insurance is only carried by small corporations, family corporations, such as I have described. They are coerced into carrying it. The insurance is carried on the lives of the men who keep up the business.

I can give you an illustration: There was a man in Indianapolis carrying on a small business, which he incorporated, making himself owner of nearly all the shares and his wife and his son directors. The wife knew nothing about the business; the boy was learning something about it. The father carried $35,000 insurance in favor of the corporation, and died April 26. The $35,000 which he had written he was carrying as insurance for his family, and one-half of that was taken by the Government. If this bill passes unamended the same thing will happen again and again.

I know of another case where a bank demanded that a man put up collateral because he was not carrying insurance of this sort in favor of a small corporation that he was running, and he said, "I shall carry insurance in favor of the United States Government when the Government pays the premium on that insurance," which was a fair way of putting it.

Now, the big corporations do not do it, but the banks make the small corporations do it, and the Federal Reserve Board requires that they do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I will.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am not sure that I know what the gentleman is driving at, but does he think that the money received by an individual ought to be a taxed income?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Oh, no; what I want to do is to include the little corporations. They are the only corporations in the world that carry this kind of insurance.

Mr. STEVENSON. That insurance is taken out for the benefit of the corporation, is it not, issued to the estate of the insured and then assigned to the corporation?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Not by any means; it is always small and it is for the small corporations. I want to conclude by saying that I think this provision will produce very little revenue if my amendment is not adopted. It will cause great hardship to families and among the smaller class of business concerns who have to pay these taxes. Further, it will be a great burden on the small business. It will result in destroying little corporation business, which is really the foundation of the great business that is to come hereafter. I think it is unfair, unjust, and unrighteous, and the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word with respect to this amendment. The income-tax law now gives very considerable latitude to different phases of the insurance business. There are constantly occurring in the course of the administration of the law loopholes in which individuals through corporations escape taxation. We found a number of large corporations, at the instance of big stockholders, had dropped into the habit of taking out policies for such individuals and paying the premiums in a way which would enable the individual to escape his proper income-tax liability and probably later on to escape his estate-tax liability.

This evil cropped out last year, and the Senate added an amendment, which is to be found on page 17, section 215, paragraph (d), which prohibits corporations that take out these policies from deducting the amounts which they pay as premiums upon them. That is in line with this provision, which is intended to stop the loophole that was being gradually opened wider and wider and through which individual stockholders receiving large incomes had their corporations handle their insurance and so escape the tax. I can appreciate certain cases of smaller concerns to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] referred; but in order to take care of them—and it only relates to little corporations—the individual beneficiary, whether a member of the family or not, is amply taken care of, both in the income-tax law and in the estate-tax law, to the extent of $40,000 exemption in the estate-tax law.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] ought to be adopted. I happen to know of certain business concerns whose success depends largely upon the ability of the men who are managing the business, and the ability of those concerns to get credit at the banks has been dependent upon their managers. In order to give the concerns credit at the banks those corporations have been carrying insurance upon their presidents or managers, so that the companies might be protected in case of their death. I know there are a great many small concerns that are to-day getting credits at banks because the managers or presidents of those concerns carry such insurance. This affects mostly small concerns, and it is that class of concerns whose success depends upon the individuals managing them. I think in cases of that kind, where insurance is collected, it ought not to be paid in large part to the Government.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman agrees, does he not, that the amount received in the way of proceeds of a policy above the amount paid for premium would be a commercial profit in any event? At least that is the way most of these laws are administered.

Mr. DENISON. It would not be a commercial profit any more than it would be a commercial profit for the gentleman's family to draw insurance on him when he dies.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the case of an annuity or any kind of investment under which a return in excess of the amount paid is received it is treated as a taxable profit.

Mr. DENISON. I know this, and I shall submit it to the gentleman. Here is a business concern in which small investors have taken stock and its success depends almost entirely upon the men who are managing it, and the ability of that concern to borrow money to run the business often depends upon the fact that the corporation is carrying insurance upon those managers to protect it in case they should die. I do not think such insurance ought to be taken by the Government in case the managers should die, and I think the fact that a large part of it will be taken as a tax will interfere with the credit of such concerns.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know of instances where corporations of considerable capital insure their managing heads as a business proposition for hundreds of thousands of dollars. Why should we except that money that is invested in the individual when it comes back to the concern?

Mr. DENISON. Well, that is an extreme case. I think the amendment ought to be adopted, and the word "individual" ought to be striken out, so as not to interfere with the business of these small corporations that are carrying insurance on their managers in order to protect their stockholders and their creditors for loss that would result to the business from their death.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DENISON) there were—ayes 19, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(4) Interest upon (a) the obligations of a State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, issued on or prior to the date of the passage of this act, or (if authorized by law on or prior to the date of the passage of this act) issued within six months after the passage of this act and containing a statement of such authorization and its date, or (if issued after the passage of this act) containing a statement that they are issued for the purpose of funding or refunding any interest-bearing indebtedness outstanding on the date of the passage of this act or for the purpose of carrying out a contract entered into on or prior to the date of the passage of this act: Provided, That there shall be excluded from gross income in the case of any person owning obligations of States, Territories, political subdivisions thereof, or the District of Columbia (the interest upon which is included in gross income), the interest upon an amount of such obligations the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000; or (b) securities issued under the provisions of the Federal farm-loan act of July 17, 1916; or (c) the obligations of the United States or its possessions. In the case of obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1917, the interest shall be exempt only if and to the extent provided in the act authorizing the issue thereof, and shall be excluded from gross income only if and to the extent it is wholly exempt from taxation both under this title and under Title III.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 10, line 2, after the word "thereof," strike out all of the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 2 on page 11.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it the gentleman's intention to incorporate the bonds already issued by States?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, my intention is to relieve the income on State bonds, and not to interfere with the United States bonds and municipal bonds from taxation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Whether now issued and outstanding or not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Whether now issued or hereafter to be issued.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Ought not the gentleman to stop with clause (c), page 18?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. After the semicolon in line 18, page 10.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman means I will accomplish the purpose desired by stopping there? Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out after the word "thereof," in line 2, page 10, down to and including the figures "$5,000," line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated in his explanation of his motion. Is there objection? (After a pause) The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment. Page 10, line 2, after the word "thereof" strike out all down to and including the figures "$5,000," in line 18.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I regret to inflict myself again upon the committee. The argument I submitted a few minutes since is applicable to the pending amendment which I have just proposed.

Unless the bill is amended, the clause in question vitally affects the States and the municipalities of the States. The power to tax is a power to impair and to destroy. This is not open to argument. The fundamental principle which I beg the committee to keep in mind is that the Nation has no more power to tax the securities of a State than the State has the power to tax the securities of the Nation. The exercise of such a power is destructive of one government or the other, I submit as an unanswerable proposition. War should not change the constitutional forms of our Republic.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman draw some distinction between taxing the bonds already issued and those which are hereafter to be issued in regard to the power of Congress?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I draw no distinction in principle. I distinguish as to the availability of the sale and value of securities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am speaking of the constitutional side.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not apprehend the distinction. If I understand this bill, it grants the broad power to the United States to tax the securities of the States or the municipalities of the States. That power has been plainly denied by the Supreme Court of the United States. I then reach the next stage, namely, that this lack of power to tax is not affected by the sixteenth amendment, for subsequent adjudications of the Supreme Court have held that that amendment does not embrace any subject or thing which was not taxable prior to the amendment. In other words, Congress has no power now to tax that which it could not tax prior to the amendment.

No argument has been advanced against the conclusions which I have just stated, unless vehement asseverations as to the necessities and distresses of war may be called an argument. Patriotic exclamations should not break down the Constitution. I submit my record for consistency and persistency in sustaining and maintaining all the efforts of our Government and of our people to win in this struggle.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not wish to make any contention against the line of argument the gentleman is making, but I think he has misapprehended the purpose of the provision of the bill he moves to strike out. This provision that he seeks to strike out relates to gross incomes. Now, while gross income has a certain bearing of course always upon net income if it is to be taxed, the question of what is to be taxed has to be determined entirely by the deductions made under the provisions with reference to net incomes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I answer the gentleman's question by asking him one?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not this provision of the bill tax incomes upon State and municipal securities?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not necessarily, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I regret I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This is merely a statemenf of what is included in gross income.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand that. But does not the gentleman believe the State bonds and municipal bonds will be depreciated by this system of taxation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is getting away from the point I was making.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am getting to the point I am trying to get the gentleman to come to. The point is that this bill places an unlawful burden upon these securities, a burden which may destroy them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Whether the bonds would be taxed by this bill depends on the deductions that are included in the paragraph which specifies the deductions that may be made in arriving at net income. That is over on page 18.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the gentleman from Iowa finished?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman has entirely misapprehended the place where the amendment should come in.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope I have misapprehended this section. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I want to suggest that while it seems to me that this part of the bill relates to gross income the draftsmen of the bill have also provided for certain things that shall be excluded in counting gross income, and some of the things to be excluded are those which are enumerated in this paragraph 4, and the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], evidently, is to say that interest upon obligations of the State, Territory, or any political subdivision shall be excluded. That is absolutely germane to the purpose of the section and in entire consonance with it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I suggest that he ought to strike out the word "Territory" if he desires to get to his point, because Territories are now only parts of the United States, and they can be taxed as we please. Your point is that we can not tax obligations of a State or any subdivision thereof.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is my purpose. With the consent of the committee I will strike out the word "Territory." I thought my amendment excluded it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] asks unanimous consent that he may modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to restate the simple proposition that the Congress has no constitutional power to tax the securities of the States or the municipalities of States. First, to tax such securities by the Federal Government is unsound and unwise legislation; and, second, such taxation radically disturbs the relation between the States and the General Government, and violates the Constitution in so doing.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that it is an ungracious task to discuss constitutional questions in this House. The Constitution when in the House of Representatives is not in the house of its friends. If power or want of power is submitted to the House the answer is generally determined by the exigencies of the occasion. We have just had an example in the eloquent argument of the able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY]. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has said that he doubts the constitutionality of the taxing section which I am now questioning. I maintain that if a Member doubts the constitutionality of a bill he has no official authority to vote for it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say in connection with what the gentleman from Virginia has said that Mr. Justice Cooley in his book on Constitutional Limitations lays down the exact doctrine which the gentleman from Virginia has just enunciated, that no Member of Congress who has any doubt as to the constitutionality of a provision can under his oath rightfully turn that question over to a court to decide.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. I had stated that to be the undoubted rule to gentlemen sitting near me.

Mr. Chairman, the destruction of our system of government will not be wrought by one blow. It will be accomplished by slow and disintegrating influences of accumulated legislative action. The imposition of this tax may not destroy, but it does impair, and as a precedent it will have imparted its virus into the system of our Federal body politic. The States have as indubitable right to live and move and have their being as has the Nation. The two governments are inseparable, and, as Webster has said, "They constitute an indissoluble union of indestructible States." [Applause.]

We can not justify the destruction of our Government at home by keeping our eyes wholly upon our armies abroad. When our soldiers return I wish them to behold the same American Republic in its dignity and majesty and form that they left. [Applause.] I wish the soldiers to understand that when they fight for the sanctity of "scraps of paper" in Europe that their Congressmen in the Halls of the Capitol will not destroy that American scrap of paper which is the chart of the free institutions of this hemisphere. [Applause.] And I wish the country to realize that the safety and integrity of the Republic lies in its adherence to the American Constitution. There is no liberty except constitutional liberty. And I submit, in conclusion, that the Constitution in spirit and purpose, and as construed by the courts and jurists of our country, repels the adoption of this section. I hope the amendment proposed, or a similar one, will prevail, whereby the harmony and vigor of our institutions may be the better preserved. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. It seems to me there is quite a distinct difference, a very sharp difference, between our right to tax the income of municipal bonds already outstanding, and our right to tax those which shall be issued in the future. I myself have very little doubt that we have the power to put a tax on the income of bonds hereafter to be issued.

There is a very broad question of public policy involved, I think, at this particular time. It seems to me our highest duty is to see to it that the market for the coming issues of liberty bonds shall be made as favorable as possible. There is no question about it that to-day many of these municipal bonds are a more attractive investment, particularly to the average man of wealth, than the liberty bonds will be under the proposed system of high surtaxes. There are at least $8,000,000,000 of nontaxable securities now outstanding in this country, and I believe it is good public policy not to add to that great reservoir into which this money may flow if the taxes are found to be too high. These new surtaxes, gentlemen, are higher than those ever imposed in any country in the world, and after all we must rely largely upon the rich men in this country, the men who are called upon to pay the surtaxes, to invest in these coming issues of liberty bonds; and if we tax them so high that they will be forced into municipal securities, here are $8,000,000,000 to-day to which they can go and pay no taxes at all to the Government. We not only destroy our revenue, but destroy the ability of people to buy these new liberty bonds. From that point of view, even though I should admit—which I do not—that this proposition is of doubtful constitutionality, it seems to me that at this time we must see to it that these municipal bonds shall not be made highly preferable to the new liberty bonds as an investment. It is largely for that reason that I support the position of the committee and oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. GORDON. Of course if Congress has the power to tax these bonds at all, it has the power to tax them 100 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. All we are doing in this bill is to provide that the income shall be taxable.

Mr. GORDON. I understand; but, of course, if Congress can impose this tax at all, it could pick them out and tax them 100 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no doubt that the Congress could.

Mr. GORDON. Thereby destroying the instrumentalities of credit of the States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is not contemplated here.

Mr. GORDON. I understand that, but you could do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it is our duty to see to it that municipal bonds are not made a higher grade of investment securities than our forthcoming issues of liberty bonds.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman says he wants to place these municipal bonds on an exact equality with the United States Government bonds. They are not on an equality as to the taxing powers of the States, are they?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are on an exact equality as far as this bill is concerned. All this proposition does is simply to say that our municipal bonds hereafter issued shall be on the same basis as United States liberty bonds, no better and no worse.

Mr. BLACK. As a reciprocal right, will the State have any right whatever to place any taxes on a United States Government bond?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, well, that is a different proposition not involved in this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the Secretary of the Treasury very strongly advocated the taxing of municipal bonds in order that the liberty-bond market might not be interfered with?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely, and it stands to reason, gentlemen. There can not be any other argument about it. In the next five or six months we will ask the public to absorb $16,000,000,000 worth of liberty bonds. These liberty bonds will be subject to all the surtaxes, whereas here are these $8,000,000,000 worth of municipal bonds subject to no surtaxes whatever, and to that extent at least a preferable investment to the liberty bonds. Is there any sound question of public policy that any bonds in this country ought to be made at this time a better investment than liberty bonds with which we have to finance this war?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Of the $8,000,000,000 in bonds, is the gentleman able to state how many are of issues of less than $100,000?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I could not possibly state that to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The Capital Issues Committee has authority now under the law, as I understand it, to supervise the issuance of bonds in the future in issues of over $100,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has not the absolute legal authority, but it has advisory authority, which is equivalent.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It might throw some light on this if we knew just about how many bonds would be issued hereafter that were subject to the approval, at any rate, of the Capital Issues Committee. If he knows what proportion of bonds now outstanding were less than one hundred thousand authorized issue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not inform the gentleman; I do not think that is essential to the discussion. The sole question is, Is it good public policy during the war to make municipal bonds equal to or better than liberty bonds?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the gentleman asks me, I do not think it is good policy and is contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Up to the time that the Supreme Court determines it, it is the gentleman's opinion against mine, and I acknowledge that his is high authority.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentlemen who favor this amendment to take away from the Federal Government the right to tax the instrumentalities of the State is based upon the principle that the power to tax is the power to destroy. There is a counter principle that is just as vital, and infinitely more vital now in a time of war. That principle is this: The lack of power to tax is the lack of power to survive. If this Government can not tax to raise the needed revenue to carry on this war, then it lacks the power to survive. I do not think there is any very great possibility of the situation going that far. Neither do these gentlemen who urge that the power to tax is the power to destroy fear that that principle will be carried to any very serious results. This thing might happen. If the bonds of a State or a municipality are allowed to go without taxation, they might absorb the bond market of the United States so that the Federal Government could not find a place to sell its bonds. Such is possible. If that situation should arise, this Government would not have the power to survive and carry on this war.

Mr. GORDON. But this very provision can be evaded and repudiated by the States by simply increasing the rate of their interest, and so create the very evil which the gentleman seeks to guard against by this legislation.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. But that would not deprive the Federal Government from receiving the tax on the income on these bonds. If they should increase the interest on their bonds that would increase the income to the Federal Government.

Let me suggest this in conclusion. This is no time to talk about State rights. This Congress and the next Congress is going to protect the rights of the States, and there will be no danger about that. The thing in hand now is to sustain the Federal Government in the hour of its need. Let us not divide upon the question as to whether the capitalist who happens to own State bonds instead of Government bonds shall contribute his share to the money needed to carry on the war. This bill requires them to contribute alike.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say that I came in during the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] after his amendment had been offered. I misunderstood the purpose and object of it. My remarks, therefore, with reference to the place where it applied were incorrect. The gentleman from Virginia was correct as to where it should be offered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman for relieving me of some misgivings.
